SENATE

FRIDAY, APRIL 22, 1932

Rev. Joseph R. Sizoo, D. D., minister of the New York Avenue Presbyterian Church, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Ever-living, Ever-loving God, whose punctual providence has rolled back the curtains of night and led forth the rejoicing sun, banish from our spirits all darkness, misunderstanding, and fear, that the sun of righteousness may shine upon us with healing in his wings.

Have in Thy gracious keeping those who are in particular need of Thy comfort. Help us to cast our cares upon Thee, knowing Thou carest for us. When Thou hearest our prayer, forgive us our sins, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. VANDENBERG and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, transmitted the resolutions of the House adopted as a tribute to the memory of Hon. EDWARD M. I also desire to announce that the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is absent by reason of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

ALABAMA SENATORIAL CONTEST—PRIVILEGE TO MR. HEFLIN

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent of the Senate in the Bankhead-Heflin contest, on Monday next, at 2 o'clock p. m., that the contestant, Mr. Heflin, be granted two hours' time of the Senate to present his side of the controversy as he sees fit. I make this request on the grounds of precedents which I understand have been made before in such cases.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, at this time I could not, as one Member of the Senate, consent to the proposal. For that reason I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made for the present.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. CAPPER presented petitions of sundry citizens of Downs, Concordia, and Stockton, in the State of Kansas, praying for the passage of the bill (H. PRESENTATION TO SENATOR MOSES

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, petitions and memorials come to us in rather odd forms at times. I have a memorial or petition, whatever it may be called, for presentation this morning which is most unusual.

From certain of my constituents, organized in what is known as the Galesburg (N. Dak.) Farmers' Union Local, I have received a club which appears to have been cut from a cottonwood tree [exhibiting]. With it come some rather broad insinuations as to how it shall be used. There is painted upon the club the following words: "Regards. Sons of Wild Jackasses."

Mr. President, considering the insinuations that were offered as to how the club might be used, I appreciate more than does anyone else my own failing at a time when temper might be lost. I certainly am not one who wants to keep any such dangerous weapon about me. I am going to ask that the club from the Galesburg Farmers' Union Local may be presented for safe-keeping to the author of the "wild jackass" utterance, the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. [Laughter.]

BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I present for printing in the RECORD at this point a letter from Mr. Chester H. Gray, of the American Farm Bureau Federation, showing the damaging effect on agriculture of certain cuts which have been proposed in the Department of Commerce appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 21, 1932.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR ODDIE: Perhaps any comment now is untimely, but I wish to commend you for having printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 19 a statement relative to the services of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce in the Department of Commerce.

Several of the activities of this bureau, noticeably those related to customs statistics and agricultural trade expansion both at home and abroad, are of the keenest interest to agriculture. Without intending to deny the necessity for economy in governmental expenditures, the observation may be permitted that economies which, when put into effect, will destroy the opportunity of citizens to make money are false economies.

It is to be hoped that some of the severe reductions of this bureau may be corrected before the supply bill for the Department of Commerce finally is enacted.

Very truly yours,

AMERICAN FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
CHESTER H. GRAY, Washington Representative.

REDUCTIONS IN PAY OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, this morning, together with the chairmen of the Committees on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate and of the House, I was presented with a petition signed by 24,000 taxpayers of the city of Milwaukee, protesting against any reductions in pay of postal employees. The petition is a mile and a quarter long and very bulky. I ask that its reception may be noted in the RECORD and that the petition may be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

PROPOSED REBATE OF COMMODITY TAX COLLECTED FROM NORTH CAROLINA

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I present a memorial at the command of the Commonwealth of North Carolina, and, in obedience to that command, I request that it be read, published in the RECORD, and appropriately referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the memorial? The Chair hears none, and the memorial will be read and appropriately referred.

The memorial of the General Assembly of North Carolina was read and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

A joint resolution requesting Congress to rebate at least 20 per cent of the commodity tax collected from North Carolina to relieve the land tax for schools of the State

The General Assembly of North Carolina do enact:

Whereas for the fiscal year 1920 the Federal Government collected from tobacco and cigarette taxes imposed in North Carolina $108,457,156.85, and in 1930, $256,729,938.33. For 11 years $2,009,878,428.98 has been collected. The income tax for 1920 was $44,962,859.99; for 1929, $20,066,795.21. The tobacco taxes have increased nearly two and a half times and the income tax lowered by over one-half. The tobacco and cigarette tax in 1929 was $233,915,029.11—an increase this year over last year of $22,814,909.22, yet North Carolina collected for all States purposes last year (1929) from income, inheritance, license, and franchise tax $15,823,932.63. Of this sum $6,500,000 was used for an equalizing fund for schools. This year the tobacco farmers are estimated to have gotten an average of about 12 cents a pound for tobacco, and the Federal Government placed a tax of about 96 cents a pound on tobacco and cigarettes—the Federal Government got eight times more a pound than the farmer. This tax tends to depress the tobacco industry and ultimately and adversely affects the tobacco farmer.

Whereas our schools (other than the equalization fund) are supported by a tax on land and 46½ per cent of our tax on land is levied for school purposes. The total levied on land for the year 1927–28 was $35,605,440.70. Since the World War every tax has been decreased except the tobacco tax, which has been increased two and a half times—which is heavy. Under the Federal law the Federal estate tax is reduced by the amount of State inheritance tax paid down to a minimum of 20 per cent of the Federal tax, by giving credit on the Federal tax of all State tax paid up to 80 per cent of the Federal tax. For example: If the Federal tax is $10,000 and the North Carolina State tax $8,000, the taxpayer pays the National Government $2,000 and the State $8,000. Thus our State collects $8,000 without increasing the taxpayer's burden. We have a precedent to request this rebate.

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring),

SECTION 1. That the Congress of the United States be requested and urged to pass a law providing that whenever any State of the Union levies a tax for revenue on any commodity or article upon which the United States Government levied a like or similar tax, the United States Government will remit to the person, firm, or corporation paying said tax an amount equal to the tax levied by the State for said purpose upon said commodity or article provided the State tax does not exceed 20 per cent of the tax levied by the United States Government.

SEC. 2. That His Excellency, Gov. O. Max Gardner, is requested to appoint a committee to memorialize Congress as to this heavy tax and take such action as they deem proper in an effort to obtain a rebate as suggested or any other method whereby a portion of this tax can be used to relieve the heavy tax on land in North Carolina; this committee to act without cost to the State.

SEC. 3. That a copy of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of State to each Senator and Member of the House of Representatives in Congress from this State, that they may use their utmost endeavor to obtain this rebate.

SEC. 4. That this resolution be in force and effect from and after its ratification.

In the general assembly read three times and ratified this 19th day of January, 1931.

R. T. FOUNTAIN,
President of the Senate.
WILLIS SMITH,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Examined and found correct.

LOVILL, for Committee.

THE FEDERAL RESERVE BANKING SYSTEM

Mr. GLASS, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, submitted a report (No. 584) to accompany the bill (S. 4412) to provide for the safer and more effective use of the assets of Federal reserve banks and of national banking associations, to regulate interbank control, to prevent the undue diversion of funds into speculative operations, and for other purposes, heretofore reported by him from that committee without amendment.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. BRATTON, from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, to which was referred the bill (S. 3852) to amend section 2288 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, with respect to the taking for highway purposes of lands entered upon under the homestead laws, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 585) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2654) to allow credit in connection with homestead entries to widows of persons who served in certain Indian wars, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 586) thereon.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 3929) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to close certain alleys and to set aside land owned by the District of Columbia for alley purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 587) thereon.

Mr. TYDINGS, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 570) to exempt from taxation certain property of the National Society of the Colonial Dames of America, in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 590) thereon.

Mr. HASTINGS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1562) for the relief of William S. Cook, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 588) thereon.

Mr. COPELAND, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 2687) to provide for the establishment of a national employment system and for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such system, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 589) thereon.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4193) to authorize the issuance of bonds by the St. Thomas Harbor Board, Virgin Islands, for the acquisition or construction of a graving or dry dock, reported it without amendment.

NATIONAL ECONOMIC COUNCIL—PRINTING OF HEARINGS

Mr. MOSES. From the Committee on Printing I report favorably without amendment Senate Concurrent Resolution 18, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the resolution be read for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Con. Res. 18) submitted by Mr. LA FOLLETTE February 18, 1932, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That, in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the printing act, approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Manufactures of the Senate be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed 3,000 additional copies of the hearings held before the committee during the current session on the establishment of a national economic council.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was considered and agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED

Mr. WATERMAN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on the 21st instant that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills:

S. 2682. An act to amend section 5 of the Criminal Code; and

S. 3086. An act relating to the construction of a Federal building at Ponca City, Okla.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF THE MILITARY AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

Mr. REED, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably sundry nominations of officers in the Regular Army, which were placed on the Executive Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 4454) to amend section 13 of the Federal reserve act by making notes of automobile finance companies subject to discount; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. COUZENS:

A bill (S. 4455) for the relief of John Moore; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HOWELL:

A bill (S. 4456) for the relief of the Bankers Reserve Life Co., of Omaha, Nebr., and Wisconsin National Life Insurance Co., of Oshkosh, Wis.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BINGHAM:

A bill (S. 4457) for the relief of Lillian L. Bushnell; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. COPELAND:

A bill (S. 4459) for the relief of Anna Marie Sanford; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McNARY (for Mr. BROOKHART):

A bill (S. 4460) to amend the Panama Canal retirement act, approved March 2, 1931; and

A bill (S. 4461) to amend the Panama Canal retirement act relating to retirement on annuities after 30 years' service; to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

DISPUTES BETWEEN COMMON CARRIERS BY AIR AND THEIR EMPLOYEES

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the pilots of various air mail lines and air transport lines are in some cases in difficulty with their employers. There is no provision of law whereby their disputes may be settled by a mediation board, as is the case with persons carrying the mails by rail. Therefore I am introducing a bill to amend the railway labor act of May 20, 1926. The purpose of this bill is to apply the procedure established by that act to the settlement of disputes between common carriers by air and their employees and to the settlement of disputes between air mail carriers and their employers. I ask that the bill may be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be received and referred.

The bill (S. 4458) to amend the railway labor act of May 20, 1926, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT OF EMERGENCY OFFICERS' RETIREMENT ACT

Mr. COPELAND submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3769) to amend the act entitled "An act making eligible for retirement, under certain conditions, officers and former officers of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps of the United States, other than officers of the Regular Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, who incurred physical disability in line of duty while in the service of the United States during the World War," which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

REVENUE AND TAXATION—AMENDMENT

Mr. HULL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 266, after line 13, insert the following:

"(3) If a petition for redetermination of a deficiency has been filed within the time prescribed by section 308 of the revenue act of 1926 and upon the date this act is enacted no final order has been entered thereon, and thereafter a final order is entered upon the basis of which additional estate, inheritance, or legacy taxes are required to be paid to any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, then credit for such payment to the extent of 80 per cent of such deficiency shall be allowed if payment is made and credit claimed within 60 days of the entry of such final order by the board."

PRINTING OF CONSOLIDATED HEARINGS ON THE TAX BILL

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I submit a Senate concurrent resolution and ask consent for its immediate consideration.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 25) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the printing act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Finance of the Senate be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed 1,500 additional copies of the consolidated hearings held before the committee during the current session on the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—ZACHARA T. EDWARDS

On motion of Mr. CAPPER, it was Ordered, That the papers filed with the bill (S. 108) for the relief of Zachara T. Edwards, Seventy-second Congress, first session, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY COMMISSION

Mr. CONNALLY submitted the following notice:

Pursuant to the provisions of Rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraph 4 of Rule XVI for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the Judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, the following amendment, viz: On page 16, after line 12, insert the following:

"That the American Section, International Water Commission, United States and Mexico, is hereby consolidated with the American Section, International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico. Hereafter the powers, duties, and functions of such section of such commission shall be exercised by the American Section, International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico.

"All records, files, and property of any nature whatsoever (including office equipment) of, and that portion of the unexpended appropriations less $25,000, for the American section of the International Water Commission, United States and Mexico, for the fiscal year 1931–32, are transferred to the American section, International Boundary Commission, and said appropriations shall be available for direct expenditure by the American section, International Boundary Commission, under the direction of the commissioner thereof. The commissioner is authorized to appoint to positions in the American section, International Boundary Commission, such employees of the American section, International Water Commission, or other persons as he may deem necessary in carrying out the provisions of this act, and said commissioner is further authorized to designate and redesignate, as he may determine to be necessary, the duties and headquarters station of all employees under his supervision."

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF BILLS

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that on April 21, 1932, the President approved and signed the following acts:

S. 1719. An act amending the act of Congress entitled "An act authorizing the Wichita and affiliated bands of Indians in Oklahoma to submit claims to the Court of Claims," approved June 4, 1924;

S. 3569. An act to amend the act of May 27, 1930, authorizing an appropriation for the reconstruction and improvement of a road on the Shoshone Indian Reservation, Wyo.; and

S. 3655. An act to provide for the leasing of the segregated coal and asphalt deposits of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indian Nations, in Oklahoma, and for an extension of time within which purchasers of such deposits may complete payments.

APPROPRIATION FOR ERADICATION OF GRASSHOPPER PLAGUE

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I desire to take just a minute to call the Senate's attention to an item in the agricultural appropriation bill, which is now in conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator from Minnesota making a statement? If not, the Senator is recognized.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. There is an item in the agricultural appropriation bill providing a sum of money for the eradication of the grasshopper plague in four or five States of the Northwest. This, so far as I know, is the only emergency item in the bill. The information which comes from that part of the country is to the effect that unless that item shall be adopted immediately, and the money may be made available at once, the chances are that millions of dollars worth of damage will be done there. So, unless the bill now in conference is here in the Senate for action by Monday morning, I shall feel it necessary to ask during the morning hour on Monday, if there be one, consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 149, which would, if adopted by the Senate and the House, lift that item out of the appropriation bill so that the money for the purpose indicated may be made available at once. I want to give notice to the Senate now that I am going to make that move on Monday morning.

INSURANCE COMPANIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA—RETURN OF BILL

Mr. CAPPER. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report an original Senate concurrent resolution, which the committee desires to have adopted, requesting the return to the Senate of a bill which is now in the hands of the President and in which it has been found a mistake has been made. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the concurrent resolution be reported for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Con. Res. 26), as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3584) entitled "An act to require all insurance corporations formed under the provisions of Chapter XVIII of the Code of Law of the District of Columbia to maintain their principal offices and places of business within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution at this time?

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was considered and agreed to.

REPRINT OF NATIONAL BANK ACT

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention for a moment of the chairman of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Printing is not here. I happen to be the ranking member, and possibly I can serve the purposes of the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, it is impossible to secure any copies of the national bank act as amended. I wish that the Committee on Printing might look into the matter, because there are many demands for the document, and, unless there are copies available, I think there should be a reprint.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the Treasury Department has an ample appropriation for printing, and evidently must have on hand copies of the national banking act.

Mr. COPELAND. It is impossible at this moment to get them from the document room.

Mr. MOSES. That is probably so, because, of course, that particular legislation, so far as the document room is concerned, is quite old, but in the Treasury Department there must be an ample supply of copies.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator for his suggestion, and I will make application there.

FUNDING OF PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO TAX BILL

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I want to submit a proposed amendment to the pending tax bill, and I ask permission to make a very brief statement in explanation of it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator making a statement? The Chair hears none.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the able senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] has pending before the Senate a resolution proposing to take the sense of the Senate on the proposition that all permanent improvements shall be taken out of the pending current Budget and funded on a longer-time basis. Without seeking in any degree to anticipate a decision upon his proposal, I am taking the liberty of submitting a proposed specific amendment to the tax bill along the same general line for the purpose simply of developing in concrete form my own previous and somewhat long-time study of the same subject, and to indicate a possible formula for such procedure.

Mr. President, the proposition comes down simply to this—Let me exemplify it: We build a $4,000,000 post office in the city of Detroit this year which undoubtedly will stand for 50 years, and yet we charge the entire 50-year investment to the harassed taxpayers in the current tax year. On the other hand, if the Ford Motor Co., for example, were to build a $4,000,000 addition to its factory in Detroit this year and were to undertake to charge it all off against its income or corporation tax this year the Government would promptly say that that is an improper economic practice and that this investment will have to be amortized over a course of years. The philosophy involved in the exhibit, it occurs to me, is well worth study, with the idea that the Government may practice the same method in respect to fixed and permanent investments which it dictates to private business.

I am not suggesting that it is conclusively justified; I am suggesting that it is entitled to serious study in the situation in which we find ourselves. We face a $2,000,000,000 deficit, and part of it will be embraced in public buildings, permanent rivers and harbors improvements, Hoover Dam, and kindred permanent improvements in excess of $300,000,000.

There is this monitory thing to be borne in mind, of course: I suppose the greatest possible encouragement to public extravagance, which has led the municipalities of the country astray during the past decade, has been the ease with which they could fund their public improvements, borrow money, and transfer the burden into the future years. Certainly it would be a calamity if that infirmity were ever to be attached to the Federal Government's activities in respect to public buildings and other permanent improvements. Certainly I would not open the Federal door to any general drain upon the Federal credit, which is our supreme and priceless reliance. Nevertheless, in the tax emergency which we now confront, when increased current taxation is one of our most serious difficulties, I submit that it is distinctly entitled to serious study as to whether or not these strictly permanent improvements, which are already within the appropriations made this year by the Congress, and which must proceed regardless of how we pay for them, should not be funded over a 10-year period with a specific program for ultimate retirement.

Therefore, out of order, I ask leave to submit the proposed amendment to the tax bill, and I ask that it may be printed in the usual form, printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Finance Committee.

There being no objection, the amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. VANDENBERG was ordered to be printed in the usual form, to be printed in the RECORD, and to be referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. VANDENBERG to the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes: On page —, line —, insert the following:

"TITLE —. PERMANENT IMPROVEMENT CONSTRUCTION FUND

"SEC. —. (a) There is hereby created a fund in the Treasury to be known as the 'Permanent improvement construction fund,' to be available for expenditure as hereinafter provided. For the purpose of providing funds to carry out the provisions of this title, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to borrow from time to time on the credit of the United States not to exceed $400,000,000, and to issue bonds therefor, to be known as 'Permanent improvement bonds,' in such form as he may prescribe. Such bonds shall be in denominations of not less than $50, shall mature 10 years from the date of their issue, and shall bear interest at such rate as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but not to exceed 4¼ per cent per annum. The principal and interest of such bonds shall be payable in United States gold coin of the present standard of value, and such bonds shall be exempt, as to both principal and interest, from all taxation (except estate and inheritance taxes and surtaxes) now or hereafter imposed by the United States, by any Territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority.

"(b) Such bonds shall be first offered at not less than par, as a popular loan, under such regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury as will give all citizens of the United States an equal opportunity to participate therein. Any portion of the bonds so offered and not subscribed for may be otherwise disposed of by the Secretary of the Treasury at not less than par. No commissions shall be allowed or paid in connection with the sale or other disposition of any such bonds. All amounts derived from the sale of such bonds shall be paid into the permanent improvement construction fund.

"(c) A sum not exceeding one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of bonds issued under authority of this section is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expenses of preparing, advertising, and issuing the same.

"SEC. —. There is hereby created in the Treasury a special cumulative sinking fund for the retirement of the bonds issued under the provisions of this title. Such sinking fund and all additions thereto shall be available until all such bonds are retired for the payment of such bonds at maturity and for the redemption or purchase thereof before maturity by the Secretary of the Treasury at such prices and upon such terms and conditions as he shall prescribe, but the average cost of the bonds so purchased shall not exceed par and accrued interest. Bonds purchased, redeemed, or paid out of the sinking fund shall be canceled and retired and shall not be reissued. For each of the first 10 fiscal years after the date of enactment of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury derived from current revenues for such fiscal years, for the purposes of such sinking fund, an amount equal to 10 per cent of the face value of the bonds authorized under this title plus an amount equal to the interest payable during each such fiscal year on the bonds then outstanding.

"SEC. —. During the next fiscal year no expenditure shall be made except out of the permanent improvement construction fund for any permanent improvement project for which an appropriation has heretofore been made or shall hereafter be made. All moneys in such fund are hereby appropriated for the construction of permanent improvement projects and shall be available for expenditure on such projects upon an order of the President stating the amount and specifically designating the project upon which such amount is to be expended. Any sums heretofore appropriated and allocated to any permanent improvement project shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator from New York making a statement? The Chair hears none.

Mr. COPELAND. I am very glad the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] has introduced an amendment to the tax bill for the purpose stated by him. The only reason why I have not yet pressed the resolution which I introduced several days ago is because of the opposition of the Treasury to this plan. I expect to do so within a short time.

It seems to me perfectly sensible that we should take from the pending appropriation bills all those items which have to do with permanent improvements; capital investment. If we were in funds now, if we had a surplus, as we have had during the past several years, we would, of course, pay these items out of the current revenues. During the past 10 years we have had so much of a surplus that we have retired $10,000,000,000 of the national debt; but now we are in a period of economic depression. It is a time when every prudent man, of course, will economize; but if, for any reason, he has occasion to make a capital investment, he is not going to pay it out of current funds which he has not in hand.

I can not see why there should be any opposition on the part of the Treasury to the issuance of bonds to pay for these permanent improvements. Of course, if it is merely a matter of pride on the part of the Treasury, if the Treasury is unwilling to have a bond issue under such circumstances as these, all right; but I am sure it is a mistaken policy. This particular matter I presented to the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York. Mind you, I am not saying "the city of New York," because if I said that everybody in the Chamber would think that naturally these "rich men in New York" do not wish to have their taxes increased. I am speaking, however, about the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York. At a largely attended dinner of that organization, which was held in January or early February, I presented this plan of taking from the current Budget the $377,000,000 which, or a large portion of which, we will expend this year, and putting that into a bond issue running over 10 or 15 years, to be paid for at a time when the country is in funds. If we had a surplus which enabled us to reduce our debt during the past 10 years to the extent of $10,000,000,000, and if we have a time now when we are poor, naturally this is a time when we might increase that debt a little bit with advantage to the country.

I do not suppose it would amount to the full amount stated by the Budget as $377,000,000; but if it is $300,000,000, that would take off the overburdened taxpayers that much to be paid this year. After consultation with many influential men on this side of the Chamber, it is my purpose later to present for the consideration of the Senate the resolution which is now upon the table.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Would not the Senator accomplish the same result if he should provide by a simple joint resolution that the interest due on the bonds owed us by foreign governments, which will be paid now in a few days, I understand about June, should be segregated and set apart for that purpose?

Mr. COPELAND. I suppose that would accomplish the same purpose. I wish that might be done, but, of course, that will not be done. There is not any reason, however, why we should go to the extent of lowering every salary in the Government service, and reducing the activities of government to the dangerous extent that we are doing it, when by putting over these items which have to do with capital investment we might very well save at least that amount of money which otherwise must be raised this year.

We have over here the House Office Building, a magnificent building. We have the Supreme Court chambers being erected. Why should the taxpayers this year pay for those items when they will be used for 25, 50, or 100 years? So my plea is that we take from the appropriation bills those items of permanent improvement, and let the payment for them run on for a few years.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McNARY. Yesterday unanimous consent was given to go forward with the Bankhead contest following the routine morning business to-day. I am enjoying this debate, but I hoped we might follow out the program which had been agreed upon. My parliamentary question is, Is debate now in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Debate is not in order without unanimous consent, and that was given. The Senator from New York was given unanimous consent to address the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. I wish to finish my statement.

I contend that this matter of balancing the Budget, and finding some way to relieve the country of the burden of taxation resting upon it, is more important than any contest that could possibly be held by this body.

I do not mean, of course, that the Senate will necessarily accept this proposal, but at least it should think about it. We have it within our power to take between three and four hundred million dollars from the proposed tax bill and let posterity pay for some of the improvements which are going on throughout this country; and I think we may well take time, even in a busy session, to give thought to that.

I know how the people of the country are suffering from taxation, and it is not alone the rich who pay. The poor pay. Every time taxes are increased that means more burden upon the poor. We have it in our power here to take three or four hundred million dollars out of this tax bill and let it be paid in years of prosperity in the future, instead of being imposed upon a burdened country at the moment.

IMPORT TAXES ON FOREST PRODUCTS

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I present for the RECORD a statement in regard to import taxes on forest products which has been furnished by Col. W. B. Greeley, secretary-manager of the West Coast Lumbermen's Association.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

BRIEF FOR IMPORT TAXES ON FOREST PRODUCTS

1. The forest industries of the Pacific Northwest, acting as a unit, respectfully request the Congress of the United States to extend the principle of protecting the natural resources of this country and the labor engaged in their conversion, already incorporated in the pending revenue bill in respect to oil and coal, to the forest resources, industries, and labor of the United States. The forest industries and their labor, now suffering from an acute financial crisis and widespread unemployment, are entitled to such protection as may be afforded by reasonable import taxes to at least an equal degree with any other natural-resource industry. And, furthermore, the imports of forest products into the United States offer an appropriate means of obtaining additional Federal revenue.

2. The import taxes which we propose are:

(1) On rough lumber of all softwood species, $3 per thousand feet board measure.

(2) On dressed lumber (planed on one side or more) of all softwood species, $5 per thousand feet board measure.

(3) On logs, poles, and piling of all species, $1.50 per thousand feet log scale.

(4) On pulpwood of all species, $1 per standard cord of 128 cubic feet.

(5) On mechanically ground wood pulp, one-sixth of 1 cent per pound, dry weight; chemical wood pulp, unbleached, one-third of 1 cent per pound, dry weight; chemical wood pulp, bleached, one-half of 1 cent per pound, dry weight.

(6) On cross-arms, shingles, laths, handles, turnery, and fence posts, 25 per cent ad valorem.

3. Present imports of forest products affected: The principal imports of forest products to which the proposed import taxes would apply are as follows for the last three years:

(1) Softwood lumber (1,000 board feet)

Year	Total	From Canada	Per cent	From Russia
1929	1,418,419	1,352,597	95.4	37,930
1930	1,146,105	1,059,982	92.5	70,767
1931	698,242	671,589	96.2	13,831

Of the above softwood lumber imported from Canada, 53.5 per cent pays a duty of $1 per thousand board feet under the tariff act of 1930. The remainder is cedar lumber or lumber of other softwood species not planed or dressed more than one side, which enters the United States duty free. The imports of cedar lumber were 46,534 thousand board feet in 1929, 37,239 thousand board feet in 1930, and 23,221 thousand board feet in 1931.

(2) Shingles (imported from Canada)

	Thousand
1929	1,716,651
1930	1,248,223
1931	998,473

Shingles now enter the United States duty free.

(3) Logs (imported from Canada)

	Thousand feet
1929	175,000
1931	158,563

Log imports enter the United States, duty free, almost wholly in Puget Sound, where they compete in the log market directly with American timber.

(4) Pulpwood (chiefly from Canada)

	Cords
1928	1,409,411
1929	1,259,007
1930	1,582,201
1931	1,021,667
FROM RUSSIA
1929	360,000
1930	238,437
1931	78,000

(5) Wood pulp (chiefly from Canada, Sweden, Finland, Norway, and Germany)

	Tons
1929	1,887,504
1931	1,421,686

4. Prospective revenue for the import taxes proposed: If the imports of the various classes of forest products specified continue at the same volume as in 1929, the Federal revenue obtained from the import taxes recommended would be approximately $20,500,000 per year. On the same volume of such imports as in 1931 the Federal revenue would be somewhat in excess of $17,000,000 per year. While some reductions in the volume of imported forest products would follow the imposition of the import taxes proposed, the revenue therefrom to the Federal Government would constitute a substantial item.

5. Other benefits from import taxes on forest products: Other benefits resulting from the import taxes proposed would be:

(1) An equalization of competitive conditions for American forest industries.

(2) Increased employment for our idle men, resulting from some increase in the volume of domestic forest products which would be absorbed by our home markets.

These benefits will now be presented in regard to the lumber industry of the Pacific Northwest and its labor and dependent communities. The critical condition of the lumber industry and the very serious regional effects of idle mills and unemployed labor necessitate any possible relief that may be obtained.

This is because, first, of the terrific shrinkage in the domestic consumption of softwood lumber. In 1929 the United States consumed 28,581,000,000 feet of softwood lumber. In 1930 consumption dropped to 21,462,000,000 feet, a shrinkage of 25 per cent. In 1931 consumption dropped to 14,573,000,000 feet, a shrinkage of 49 per cent. The consumption for 1932 indicated by the lumber sales to date will not exceed 12,000,000,000 feet, a shrinkage of 58 per cent below the level of 1929. The use of lumber this year is back to approximately the basis of 1869.

This sudden and rapid shrinkage in the consumption of lumber in the United States has forced upon the domestic industry a most drastic curtailment in production, closed down over half of its sawmills, and thrown over 60 per cent of its labor out of employment.

Notwithstanding this distress and sacrifice from the curtailment of production, the survey of the United States Timber Conservation Board on December 31, 1931, showed nearly 8,000,000,000 feet of softwood lumber in stock at American mills, or over half the preceding year's consumption. The Timber Conservation Board found these stocks to be 2,600,000,000 feet in excess of sound and reasonable inventories, and recommended a reduction of that amount as rapidly as practicable.

Under such conditions every foot of imported lumber simply adds to the distress and unemployment in the American industry, while bringing no benefit whatsoever to lumber consumers. The lumber imports of the last three years more than equal the present excess of softwood stocks, as determined by the Timber Conservation Board, which are breaking the back of the domestic industry.

The critical condition of the American industry is due, in the second place, to an almost proportionate loss of foreign markets for its products. In 1929 our softwood exports were 2,609,000,000 feet. In 1930 they dropped to 1,856,000,000 feet, a shrinkage of 25 per cent. In 1931 there was a further drop to 1,325,000,000 feet, a shrinkage of 49 per cent below the level of 1929.

The reasons for this drastic loss of foreign markets go far beyond the shrinkage in their consumption. They include:

(1) Depreciated currencies and rates of exchange, which are diverting export lumber trade from the United States to Canada. Since Canadian exchange dropped below par, Canadian exporters have had an advantage of from 10 to 20 per cent over American exporters in the delivered price of softwood lumber, transportation included, at most of the common competitive foreign markets. American shippers even suffer discrimination from American subsidized steamship companies in the Pacific, who accept freight payments from British Columbia shippers in Canadian funds, but require payment from American shippers in American funds.

(2) The preferential tariffs within the British Empire, which are rapidly closing many important former markets to American lumber. The trade agreement between Australia and Canada, made effective nearly a year ago, gives the Canadian lumber exporter a preference of 20 shillings per thousand board feet on the usual Douglas fir items and has largely shut out American lumber from this market. South Africa gives Canadian lumber a preferential tariff of 3 per cent; Great Britain a preferential tariff of 10 per cent, with every indication that it will be materially increased in pursuance of the British Empire trade policy. American lumber exports to Great Britain have already shrunk materially, and that market will hereafter be practically closed to our sawmills.

(3) Many special tariffs, quotas, and embargoes adopted in recent months by foreign countries have materially diminished—in some instances completely closed—former export markets of the American lumber industry. For example, application of the French embargo system has, at least for the time being, completely closed that market to American lumber.

In the case of the lumber industry on the Pacific coast the operation of these factors has to a large degree diverted export business from the United States to Canada. Between 1929 and 1931 American sawmills on the west coast lost 43 per cent of their export business (1929, 1,613,000,000 feet; 1931, 917,000,000 feet). In the same period British Columbia lumber exports dropped but 10 per cent (1929, 399,000,000 feet; 1931, 358,000,000 feet).

West coast lumber exports in January and February of 1932 were at the lowest ebb for 20 years (91,000,000 feet), shrinking 40 per cent below 1931 and 66 per cent below 1929. In the same two months, however, the water-borne lumber movement from British Columbia increased 22 per cent over the corresponding months of 1931 (1931, 90,000,000 feet; 1932, 111,000,000 feet). In the same period British Columbia lumber exports to Great Britain increased 58 per cent over the corresponding months of the previous year, and British Columbia lumber exports to China and Japan increased 73 per cent. A consular report in March states that the British Columbia sawmills operated in February at 44.5 per cent of their capacity. During the same month American mills on the west coast operated at 22 per cent of capacity.

6. The American lumber industry is in the thick of a trade war at home and abroad; the lumber industry of Canada frankly declares that the entire British Empire is its domestic market. American lumber will be excluded therefrom by high preferential tariffs.

Depreciated exchange is Canada's powerful weapon for wresting other export markets from American lumber products. To the extent the American producer sells in such markets it can only be at the ruinous prices established by Canada's lower cost of production and transportation.

At the same time Canada retains an American market for 30 to 35 per cent of her lumber production by virtue of—

(1) A normal lower production cost, with no offsetting duty on 46.5 per cent of her softwood lumber exports to the United States; no duty on shingles; and no duty on logs. There is no trade reciprocity, in fact, under the no-duty provision of the tariff act of 1930 on lumber rough or dressed one side, because the movement is practically all one way—from Canada into the United States.

(2) An average lower intercoastal transportation cost than that available to American mills on the west coast to American markets on the Atlantic seaboard. This affects from 15 to 20 per cent of the Canadian lumber imports. British Columbia shippers may employ any foreign-flag tonnage in moving their lumber to American ports, an opportunity denied the American shipper under our marine laws. Experience has demonstrated that whenever the American intercoastal lumber rate exceeds $9 per thousand board feet, foreign-flag tonnage is freely employed by British Columbia shippers at less than the American rate. For example, within a few weeks after the American intercoastal rate of $10 per thousand board feet had been announced for the month of March, 1932, five cargoes were chartered by British Columbia shippers at rates reported to be $9 per thousand board feet.

(3) The depreciation in exchange, which applies not only to costs of production but also to costs of transportation both by rail and water. The portion of the cost of rail haul from Canadian mills to American markets which is over Canadian railways is paid in Canadian funds. Foreign-flag charters for water transportation from Canadian mills to American markets are commonly reported as paid in Canadian funds. To a considerable extent, therefore, the gain from depreciated Canadian exchange applies to the delivered price of the product at American selling points.

On account of these competitive advantages, American lumber is to-day commonly undersold in its own domestic markets by Canadian lumber. This applies particularly on the Atlantic seaboard and the "back-haul" territory available to it and in the large competitive markets in the regions of the Great Lakes and prairie States. American sawmills have been constantly forced to meet lower prices until they were compelled to shut down.

7. These adverse factors have brought on a crisis in the lumber industry of the Pacific Northwest with widespread unemployment. Western Oregon and Washington contained on December 31, 1931, 722 "living" sawmills, of which 320 operated to some extent during 1931 and 402 were down completely.

Of the productive sawmill capacity of the region, 73 per cent was utilized in 1929, 54 per cent in 1930, 36.8 per cent in 1931, and 22 per cent in the first quarter of 1932. Mills representing 40 per cent of the region's capacity were shut down completely during much of 1931 and are "down indefinitely" at the present time. Most of the mills attempting to operate are running from 24 to 36 hours per week.

The lumber produced in 1931 represented a shrinkage of 48 per cent from the production in 1929; and the lumber produced in the first quarter of 1932 showed a shrinkage of 66 per cent below the same period in 1929 (1929, 10,377,000,000 feet; 1931, 5,368,000,000 feet; 1932, 3,500,000,000 feet indicated).

The volume of lumber sales in 1931 shrank 45.3 per cent below 1929; and the volume of sales to date in 1932 has shrunk 58.4 per cent below the corresponding period of 1929.

The average price received by west coast mills for the lumber sold in February, 1932, showed a shrinkage of 48.6 per cent below the average price received in the spring of 1929.

(Average sales price of 162 key items reported by Davis Statistical Bureau, of Portland, Oreg.: May, 1929, $20.18 per M feet; February, 1932, $10.36; less, $9.82 per M feet.)

In seven out of the last eight years the average west coast sawmill has not recovered its cost of production on lumber sales, with no interest included. This is based upon complete operating costs and sales returns at a considerable number of representative mills reporting to the West Coast Lumbermen's Association. In 1930 the average operating loss, without interest, was $2.10 per M board feet; in 1931, $2.16 per M board feet. These losses represented about 75 per cent of the average cost of the standing timber manufactured.

The mills attempting to operate in 1932, on the average, recover neither interest nor cost of standing timber and largely fail to recover depreciation. In many cases only actual labor and supply costs are recovered without tax or insurance charges. The west coast lumber industry is subsisting at all only by heavy drains upon its capital assets and credit resources. The industry is on the verge of almost complete financial collapse.

These conditions have resulted in a terrific shrinkage in the value of the timber lands which constitute the principal basic resource of the region and its largest source of tax revenue to States and counties. Tax-delinquent timber lands are rapidly increasing and already seriously threaten the income of local government and communities.

There is a like shrinkage and threat of complete collapse in the value of the Federal-owned timber lands in national forests, Indian reservations, and revested grants, which contain 38 per cent of all the timber in the region.

The most serious effect of all these distressing conditions on the west coast is the appalling shrinkage in employment. The primary logging and sawmill industries of western Oregon and Washington employed 94,000 men in 1929. The additional employment in the pulp and paper industry, sash and door plants, and other woodworking factories brought the aggregate up to approximately 125,000 employees. The forest industries are the great basic sources of labor employment in the region, supplying over 60 per cent of its total industrial pay rolls. The logging and lumber industries alone, in 1929, disbursed $120,000,000 in pay rolls.

Employment was steadily forced down during 1930 and 1931. In the first quarter of 1932 less than 35,000 men, or 37 per cent of the normal number of workers, were obtaining any employment in the sawmills and logging camps. At least two-thirds of this number were working on short shifts of from 24 to 36 hours per week, or intermittently—a few days or a week at a time. In hours per month present employment is not over 20 per cent of that in 1929. And the economic distress of the industry has forced an average shrinkage of probably 40 per cent in the hourly wage as compared with 1929.

The Pacific Northwest is wholly without other industries or resources capable of providing for even a small fraction of the seventy or seventy-five thousand men who have lost their normal employment in forest industries. Tremendous efforts have been made to provide relief through both public and private agencies, but these are approaching exhaustion. The effect of unemployment upon many northwestern communities built in connection with and dependent upon forest industries is serious in the extreme. Many cases could be cited where, with 20 per cent or more of their people now on public charge and with both public and private financial resources and credit almost exhausted, such communities face complete economic and social collapse.

Every additional thousand feet of lumber that can be produced in the United States by protecting our home market means two days' labor for logging camp and sawmill workers. We respectfully submit that the National Government should provide the only effective solution of this staggering problem of unemployment in the Pacific Northwest by permitting its major industries to resume some degree of their normal activity.

8. All forest products should be dealt with as a whole: At least in the Pacific Northwest a unified policy of import taxes dealing with all forest products is essential for the following reasons:

(1) Only such a policy will effectively conserve the value and tax-paying capacity of the basic natural resource, standing timber, and permit its economic utilization with a minimum of waste.

(2) All of the various forest products come out of the same forest and the same logging operations where the different classes and species of timber occur together. Economical logging requires varied markets for the different classes of material produced—pulp plants for logs of certain species, cedar lumber and shingle plants for cedar logs, and so forth.

(3) Further manufacture is closely integrated, as in the case of pulp mills, which afford a market for much of the waste material from sawmills, both as pulp stock and fuel.

That is, efficient use of raw material and economical production require maintenance of all the different forms of forest industries. Therefore they should all share in the protective benefits of a Government policy.

While dealing primarily with the lumber industry of the Pacific Northwest we believe that the conditions set forth apply to all forest regions and industries of the United States, and that the national emergency in these and other natural-resource industries demands relief through import taxes on their products.

Respectfully submitted.

"A NEW JOB FOR CONGRESS"

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Mr. William Hirth, publisher of the Missouri Farmer, entitled "A New Job for Congress."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. HARRY B. HAWES,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: As per my promise to you when I recently appeared before the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, I herewith submit my views on the necessity of giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix the rates of interstate truck and bus carriers, and to surround the latter with other regulations in the interest of sound public policy. When witnesses appear before a congressional committee the frequent questions asked by the members make it difficult to follow a consecutive line of thought, and I therefore welcome this opportunity to restate what I intended to say in a more coherent manner.

In this connection I am glad to note that the Interstate Commerce Commission has asked Congress for the above authority; and if it is granted, I hope the commission will not proceed upon the theory that it must go through a long process of experimentation, for the need for this character of regulation is immediate and acute. Also I am not in accord with the suggestion of the commission that the railroads and water lines be encouraged to make a greater use of our public highways. As I will endeavor to show later, the congestion on the highways is already such that there is little room left for the motorist.

There is an old and oft-repeated saying that "competition is the life of trade," and thus it is not surprising that many Members of Congress, as well as laymen, have welcomed the new competition which trucks and busses have offered to the railroads during the last few years. But there is another old saying that "all is not gold that glitters," and I think this applies most forcibly in the present instance. That, generally speaking, competition should be preserved in all the great fields of industry goes without saying, but we should always have a care lest such competition leads to demoralization and thus becomes a vice rather than a virtue, and I think this is inevitable in the realm of transportation unless Congress takes a hand and formulates a definite nation-wide policy with reference to interstate truck and bus carriers which are expanding their operations by leaps and bounds, and which under existing conditions are a law unto themselves.

A MENACE TO FARM ORGANIZATIONS

It happens that I am the president of the Missouri Farmers' Association, which besides its larger centralized marketing agencies operates elevators and exchanges in nearly 400 Missouri towns; and when I tell you that our yearly volume of business in grain, livestock, poultry and dairy products, feed, flour, fertilizer, etc., is in excess of $100,000,000, you will appreciate that in these times of depressed farm prices not only is our association overwhelmingly the largest farm organization in any State in the Union but it is a question whether there is a larger one in the country, and, therefore, the problem of transportation is one of tremendous importance to us. That our nearly 400 elevators and exchanges, in which our thousands of farmer members have an investment of approximately $5,000,000, have saved the farmers of Missouri millions of dollars during the last 15 years in an increased price for farm commodities and in a lowered price of feed, flour, fertilizer, etc., is true beyond question, and in proof at the end of the year the profits earned by these elevators and exchanges are divided among our members in proportion to the business each has done, and thus these agencies are operated on a purely cost basis, and more than this a cooperative can not hope to achieve.

In addition to the above elevators and exchanges as late as three years ago we were also operating approximately 350 livestock-shipping associations, which gather up the local hogs, cattle, calves, and sheep when they are ready for market, and then they are shipped by rail to the big stockyard centers to our cooperative livestock commission companies, through which they are sold to the packers, order buyers, butchers, etc., and through these terminal marketing agencies we have returned several million dollars in saved commission charges to our members in Missouri and to the members of allied farm organizations in the adjoining States. However, when three years or more ago the trucks appeared upon the scene, we suddenly found ourselves confronted by an entirely new situation; and as time has gone on, this situation has become increasingly menacing to the very existence of our association; during the early stages of truck expansion the trucker said to the farmer, "Why should you go to the trouble of hauling your livestock to town when I am glad to come to your farm and get it and when I am willing to haul it to market for only a little more than you would have to pay to ship it by rail?" This argument appealed to so many farmers that in a little while we found it impossible to gather up a weekly carload shipment at many points, and as a result many of our livestock-shipping associations have gone out of existence, and at this time the strongest of them are seriously menaced.

FARMER HASN'T THOUGHT IT THROUGH

Perhaps at first thought you will say, "If the trucker can offer a more convenient service to the farmer than the railroads, why should not the farmer avail himself of it?" And everything else being equal, this should decide the matter; but the facts are that the "shrink" of livestock by truck is much greater than by rail; and this is true because, as the trucks whirl around the innumerable curves on the average highway at a speed of 40 or 50 miles per hour, and go up and down hill, the livestock is constantly lunging from side to side, or from end to end, with the result that it often reaches the stockyards in such a nervous condition that it will neither drink nor eat, and thus a good "fill" is impossible; also many truckers deliver the farmers' livestock to packers who buy direct (not through a public stockyard) on the theory that this will save the farmer the usual selling commissions, feed, yardage charges, etc., and many farmers "fall" for this argument without considering the fact that this policy undermines the great competitive livestock markets where packers and other buyers are compelled to bid against each other, and which situation the livestock producers of the country should maintain at all hazards. When livestock is shipped by rail the movement is much less violent than by truck; and hence when it arrives at the stockyards it is not only ready for a good fill, but with fewer bruises, and also the railroads are interested in preserving the great central livestock markets, and thus it can be seen that the average farmer could well afford to ship by rail even if he is compelled to haul his livestock to the nearest shipping point, and even though the rail rates were somewhat higher, and I cite these facts merely to show that shipping by truck is not in fact in the interest of the farmer, and if it were, the big farm organizations would be the first to give their hearty approval.

It is true that the farmer is not compelled to pay selling commissions, yardage, etc., when his livestock is delivered to a direct packer buyer; but since such a packer is a mere "camp follower" of the big public stockyards in point of price, and since he names without competition the price he is willing to pay, and from which there is no appeal, is it not safe to assume that in the end the farmer loses more than the commissions, yardage, etc., he would pay at a big terminal market? Certainly the direct packer buyer has a reason for wanting to do business in this way, and certainly this reason is not in the interest of the livestock producer, except that trucking has expanded so rapidly that the farmer as yet has not seen both sides of the picture.

A few years ago the marketing of livestock by the big cooperatives seemed one of the finest fields that beckoned to us; and this not only because our big terminal market commission companies were returning hundreds of thousands of dollars in saved commission charges to our members annually, but by controlling livestock from the country shipping point to the stockyards we were getting in a fair way to stabilize terminal market prices. But with thousands of unregulated trucks breaking down our livestock-shipping associations and delivering livestock to direct packer buyers, and thus weakening the big central competitive markets, and by ignoring our terminal market agencies at other times, this means that one of the greatest opportunities of the cooperative movement has been largely shot into a cocked hat, and as a result the big Corn Belt cooperatives have been greatly enfeebled.

In the meantime, during the last two years the trucker has begun to say to our farmers, "If you will allow me to haul your livestock, and happen to need feed, such as bran, shorts, tankage, poultry feed, fertilizer, etc., I have made arrangements to buy these commodities at the wholesale price, and I will gladly deliver them to your door on this basis in order to get a back haul"—and then the truckers get as much out of the farmer as they can, figuring that they are killing two birds with one stone, first, that in this way they secure a pledge of the farmer's livestock, and second, that even though the back-haul charge is largely nominal, it is that much "velvet" in any case. First, the trucks broke up many of our livestock-shipping associations, and now they menace the existence of our nearly 400 elevators and exchanges, in which, as I have said, our members have an investment of $5,000,000; and this because when the truckers offer to deliver feed, fertilizer, etc., to the farmer's door at the wholesale price, plus a nominal back-haul charge, neither a cooperative agency nor an independent dealer can long hope to hold their own against such competition. And if somebody asks, "Does not this mean cheaper service to the farmer?" I ask the counterquestion, "Suppose it does on the commodities I have mentioned, but suppose that this practice destroys the big cooperatives, which we have spent years in building up and which market the farmer's grain, livestock, poultry, and dairy products direct to the big consuming centers, and which offer the only hope of the farmer ever having anything to say about what he shall receive for the fruits of his toil?" In this case will not the farmer in the end have traded his birthright for a mess of pottage? We can not pay the operating expense of our elevators and exchanges throughout the year without making a modest profit on feed, flour, fertilizer, etc., and this is why I say that the trucks have begun to menace the existence of these agencies.

OUR ENTIRE DISTRIBUTIVE MACHINERY THREATENED

In their zeal to get a back haul of some kind the livestock truckers and other truckers have almost completely captured the less-than-carload hauling of local merchants, and yet, in my opinion, the latter are penny-wise and pound-foolish, for already certain truckers are peddling merchandise direct to the townspeople just as they are peddling feed to the farmer, and therefore does not this practice threaten to destroy those of our independent merchants who have thus far survived the deadly competition of the chain stores? Certain truckers are also buying up the choice eggs and chickens of the farmer, while the inferior grades are left for our elevators and exchanges and the local merchants to handle as best they can, and thus the demoralization grows apace, and threatens the distributive machinery of the whole Nation in which hundreds of millions of dollars are invested.

So serious had these conditions become that in the winter of 1930 the executive committee of our association sponsored certain truck and bus bills in the Legislature of Missouri, and as a result these measures were passed by comfortable majorities. These bills regulate the size of trucks and busses, and give our State public service commission the right to fix the intrastate rates of such carriers; and yet with St. Louis and Kansas City (which are our principal markets) located on the State lines of Illinois and Kansas, the latter provision is very largely meaningless. The National Stockyards, which are our leading livestock market, are located in East St. Louis, on the Illinois side, while by driving a few blocks farther upon one pretext or another, the truckers who haul to the Kansas City Stockyards can likewise qualify as interstate carriers, and thus they are in position to snap their fingers in the face of our public service commission, and the only remedy in sight is for Congress to give the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix the rates of interstate truck and bus carriers—then and not until then will order come out of chaos, as it did years ago when the Interstate Commerce Commission and our various State public service commissions put an end to a similar demoralization with reference to the railroads.

LONG HAULS IMPORTANT FACTOR

In order to defend ourselves as best we can, some months ago we began to operate local trucks in certain communities, gathering up the livestock that was ready for market, and then shipping it by rail; at one point where the truckers were charging 50 cents per hundredweight for hauling livestock to East St. Louis, our trucks charged 12 cents per hundredweight to bring the livestock into the local shipping point; and after adding the rail charge, the total charge to the farmer amounted to 35 cents per hundredweight, thus effecting a saving for the farmer of 15 cents per hundredweight; thereupon one of the leading truckers reduced his charge to 35 cents, while another cut to 25 cents, and this merely goes to show that under existing conditions we are powerless to combat the situation, for faced with the loss of their business, the truckers will reduce their rates almost to the vanishing point—and the mere fact that they can not long exist on such a basis offers no comfort, for when one trucker is forced out, there are always two new and inexperienced ones to take his place. And until the interstate trucks are brought under control, the enforcement of a fair intrastate rate is greatly handicapped—first, because, as I have said, our livestock movement (which is the backbone of the trucking business) is very largely interstate, and because the enforcement of intrastate rates substantially higher than the interstate rates would soon bring on a public outcry, and hence early action by Congress is the only solution.

And here is another practical certainty that stares us in the face: In the course of the average year, our association ships in several thousand carloads of corn, oats, etc., from the outside States, and we also ship hundreds of carloads of eggs, poultry, sweet cream, and butter to the distant eastern markets, and all of these hauls are long ones in which the railroads are indispensable; therefore, if the trucks and busses are permitted to pick off the cream of the short-haul traffic, in the end will not the Interstate Commerce Commission be compelled to greatly increase the rail rates on the long hauls, a character of traffic for which the trucks are not practical? Already the existing rail rates on grain and cattle out of the distant Northwest, West, and Southwest are a burden which, under the present low price of grain and livestock is almost unbearable, while if there is any material increase in these long-haul rates, they will become utterly confiscatory, and this is likewise true of long merchandise hauls, which, in the end, must come out of the consumer's hide. And, therefore, should not this long-haul problem have the serious thought of Congress? If in this character of traffic the railroads are indispensable, then can not anybody see the direction into which we are drifting? If the long-haul rail rates are materially increased, it will place tens of thousands of farmers who live long distances from the central markets in an almost impossible position, and I, therefore, have little patience with those who are constantly looking for a chance to "pound" the railroads without rhyme or reason, and who are too short-sighted to see what it is leading up to.

POUNDING HIGHWAYS TO PIECES

And now I desire to mention a phase of this matter which, in my opinion, is the most incongruous of all. During recent years our Government and the several States have invested approximately $12,000,000,000 in hard-surfaced highways which cover the country from end to end. Ostensibly these highways were built in the interest of the motorist; and yet no sooner were they ready for service than they were appropriated for private gain by the owners of trucks and busses, and this without compelling these carriers to contribute anything to the original construction cost of these highways, or even to contribute substantially to their maintenance—for such contribution as they make in the latter respect through license fees and a gasoline tax amount to a mere bagatelle, claims to the contrary notwithstanding.

No. 40, the main highway between St. Louis and Kansas City, cost approximately $10,000,000. It has been in use only about four years, and already I think I am safe in saying that 5 per cent of it has been resurfaced, and during the last year its deterioration has been rapidly increasing, and all because of the incessant pounding of the giant trucks and busses which cease neither day nor night. I understand that recently the ex-chairman of our State highway commission made the statement that this great highway will have to be completely rebuilt during the next three years, and in this case the bonds for its original construction will not have run half their maturity period; and if he is right, as I am sure he is, then where are we to get the millions of dollars that will be needed to replace it? In the meantime, as the trucks and busses increase, deadly accidents are likewise increasing, and this not only because of increasing congestion but because the motorist can not see past these huge trucks and busses, and thus he must be content to frequently trail them for a considerable distance, or take chances of a collision with an oncoming car, truck, or bus if he passes them. As a matter of fact, if this character of traffic keeps on increasing, the time is not far distant when the motorist will be driven off our leading highways entirely; and yet it was presumably in his interest that the Government and the States invested the gigantic sum of $12,000,000,000 in our great highway system; and, in my opinion, this situation constitutes the most idiotic and indefensible performance of its kind in the history of our country, and the only way in which we can hope to somewhat make amends is to compel trucks and busses to henceforth contribute their full share toward highway maintenance, and to fix their rates sufficiently high to enable them to do so.

Confined to the motorist, our highways would have lasted almost indefinitely, but, as things stand, the damage done by trucks and busses to our nation-wide highway system already mounts into hundreds of millions of dollars, and how much longer will our Government and the States continue a policy so unsound? Nearly all our leading highways parallel the railroads which are compelled to adhere to published rates, while the trucks and busses are free to prey upon their most desirable patronage as they please, and to make whatever rates they please, and in all decency is this fair?

In saying these things I certainly do not do so as a special pleader for the railroads, for as president of the Missouri Farmers' Association, and chairman of the Corn Belt Committee, which speaks for the big farm organizations of the Central States, I not only vigorously opposed the railroads in the Western Rate case some years ago, but I did likewise with reference to the 15 per cent freight increase for which they asked in 1931, and the records of the Interstate Commerce Commission will bear out this statement. But I can see what a menace the unregulated trucks have become to the continued existence of great cooperatives like the Missouri Farmers' Association, and likewise I see the menace they are with reference to the long-haul rates in which, as the picture looks now, the railroads will be indespensable for a long while to come. All in all, the situation is a good deal as it was years ago when the railroads were a law unto themselves, and when Congress was finally compelled to give the Interstate Commerce Commission authority over interstate rates, leaving it to the public-service commissions of the State to adjust intrastate rates accordingly, and in my opinion it is imperative that Congress adopt a similar policy with reference to trucks and busses, and no time should be lost in doing so—and I repeat that trucks and busses should be compelled to contribute their full share toward the maintenance of our highways, and that their rates should be fixed with this end in view.

A MISGUIDED TRANSPORTATION POLICY

And here I can not refrain from saying that in my opinion the general attitude of Congress during recent years toward our nation-wide transportation problem has been neither constructive nor in the interest of sound public policy. If it is really true that the railroads are the "backbone" of our transportation system, then why should not Congress have long since thrown a protecting arm around them, not in the interest of Wall Street, but to the end that rail rates might have been forced down to a minimum in the interest of all the people?

Is it consistent, on the one hand, to say through the Esch-Cummins Act that the railroads are entitled to a net return of 5¾ per cent and then on the other hand to appropriate hundreds of millions of dollars for highways and deep waterways and permit private individuals and corporations to use these subsidized agencies for private gain practically free of charge and thus make it impossible for the railroads to earn the net which the Esch-Cummins Act vouchsafes to them? Is such a policy fair to the railroads, or is it sound from a public standpoint? Should not Congress determine what agency or agencies can best serve the transportation needs of most of our people and then protect such agency or agencies in order that the rates may be kept as low as possible? If it is wise to have only one telephone and one light and power company in the same city in order to give the people the benefit of the lowered operating costs, should not the same general principle apply to transportation as near as possible? In other words, when we encourage as many different modes of transportation as Joseph's coat had colors, do we not increase the general burden on the public?

For a good many years we have had a certain type of so-called statesmen who have posed as "friends of the people" by everlastingly jumping onto the railroads, and usually these gentlemen dwell long and loud upon the sins of Wall Street, and in this latter connection I would like to see Congress surround railroad financing with sufficient safeguards so that racketeering bankers will be compelled to choose between jail and decency, for it is perfectly true that there have been many conscienceless and indefensible performances in these premises. But granting that stringent safeguards of this kind are needed, we should realize that the railroads are a tremendous factor in the Nation's prosperity, and this is true because 50 cents or more out of every dollar they collect for service immediately finds its way into the pockets of the approximately 2,000,000 men and women they employ in normal times, yet this is only half the story, for in normal times the railroads consume 25 per cent of the output of our steel mills, 25 per cent of the output of our coal mines, and 20 per cent of the output of our lumber and cement mills, and thus indirectly they supply employment to perhaps a million or more additional workers. Also in practically every State the railroads are our heaviest taxpayers, and therefore they make a heavy contribution to the support of our public schools and higher institutions of learning, and in paying the costs of State, county, and municipal government; and finally, billions of dollars of railroad securities are owned by our great life-insurance companies and savings banks, and have we any funds in our Nation that are more sacred or more entitled to the solicitude of our Government?

EXISTENCE OF RAILROADS AT STAKE

For the above reasons it seems to me that Congress should lose no time in putting an end to the demoralization which has been created by the rapidly expanding truck and bus traffic, a situation which at this hour threatens to drive every railroad in the country upon the rocks; next, I think it should stop using the money of our taxpayers in creating new agencies of transportation which are appropriated for private gain—certainly the least the taxpayer can ask in these premises is that these new agencies shall reimburse the Government and the States dollar for dollar. In my opinion, unless a policy of this kind is adopted, not a railroad in the country will escape a receivership, and in the ensuing chaos the people will, as usual, be compelled to "pay the fiddler." As matters now stand, the railroads personify a giant bull who has a ring in his nose and who is tethered to a tree, and thus completely at the mercy of competing trucks, busses, pipe lines, deep waterways, and airplanes, which are free to assault him as they will, while the Government and the States look on unconcerned; yea, more than unconcerned, for the service of the trucks, busses, deep waterways, and airplanes is being subsidized at tremendous public expense, and that this policy, if continued, means the early destruction of the railroads, lock, stock, and barrel, is as certain as the rising and setting of the sun. Already many branch lines have been abandoned, and thus the doors are locked on hundreds of small-town stations in which only yesterday an obliging station agent was known by his first name to every man, woman, and child. And when the deep snows and blizzards of winter come these towns will be without service, for the trucks and busses are fair-weather birds which come and go when and as they please. If the railroads have outlived their usefulness, then perhaps the impending tragedy is inevitable, but should not Congress and the States make sure that this is really true? No one will deny that these competing agencies of transportation have a rightful place in the picture, but they should be so regulated that they will not undermine and demoralize our entire transportation structure.

SHORT SELLING ON THE NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I have received from Lloyd Maxwell, one of the leading business men of Chicago, a telegram commenting on the short-selling investigation, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., April 18, 1932.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,

Senator from Kansas, Washington:

I believe the investigation of short selling should be pressed with aggressive and competent counsel and expert investigators in order to reveal the identity of many short sellers and the extent of their operations which should prove to be one of the major causes of the depression. Further, I believe if the exchange is not regulated and controlled in the future it will seriously retard the early return of prosperity. Destruction of security values has in turn destroyed the basis of credit which in turn has correspondingly destroyed the buying power of millions of shareholders and investors and obviously the inevitable consequence is a great depression in business. Property values can not be overdeflated without an overdeflation of general business. With short-selling attacks on security values and property in general the inevitable result is liquidation, both forced and panicky. Liquidation in general has been an effect and not a cause. Creative and constructive efforts must supplant deflationary and destructive propaganda, and to safeguard the future it is necessary to expose the past, which should embrace a comprehensive investigation of the various activities of the New York Stock Exchange and its complicated machinery, including the dangerous privileges of the specialist, who can trade as a principal while acting as an agent. Every effort is being made to suppress the investigation of the New York Stock Exchange because of the fear of exposure by leading bears, many of whom may have violated important fiduciary relations while secretly and actively contributing to the continuous depression.

LLOYD MAXWELL,
President Williams & Cunnyngham.

PRICES OF FARM PRODUCTS

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to make a short statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think I must object. Last evening the Senate clearly indicated a desire to go forward with the debate on the privileged question now before the Senate, and it was thought that we might get started immediately following the morning business to-day. If the Senator will wait until later in the day, I think he will have an opportunity to make the remarks he has in mind.

Mr. HOWELL. I simply ask unanimous consent to make a very short statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, since the Senator assures me that the statement he desires to make will be very brief, I shall not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I again desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that during this Congress nothing of a constructive character has been done for the farmer. The plight of the agricultural regions is most acute. Reports from counties in my State, Nebraska, indicate that the farmers are receiving in some sections such prices as 27 cents per bushel for wheat, 19 cents per bushel for corn, from 13 to 18 cents per pound for butterfat, 9 cents per pound for chickens, 6 cents per dozen for eggs, and even in western Iowa $3.15 per 100 pounds for hogs.

This means that the farmer is receiving less than one-half for his products as compared with average prices for the period from 1909 to 1914; but, mark you, he is paying for the things he buys from 15 to 20 per cent more than he paid during that same period, and it is not by any means all due to the existing depression. No improvement in economic conditions generally can be expected so long as such a differential prevails against the farmer. That must be evident, because the buying power of the whole rural population—nearly one-half of our population—is practically the same as that of the farmer, because of the prevailing prices for agricultural products.

Not only has this Congress failed to act constructively for the farmer, but there is no measure of such a character pending on the calendar of the Senate. What are we going to do about it? Only a little more than one month remains of this session. Are we to go back and tell the farmer we are helpless or that we could not even attempt legislation? Certainly such answers will not suffice, and I give warning here that such is the case. Such answers will be resented. No other result can be expected.

REDUCTION OF GOVERNMENT SALARIES

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I send to the desk a letter from Mr. C. E. Johnston, president of the Kansas City Southern Railway Co. It is just a 1-page letter, and I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Out of order and without objection, the letter will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE KANSAS CITY SOUTHERN RAILWAY CO.,
Kansas City, Mo., April 18, 1932.

To all employees:

Government employees from the highest to the lowest are servants of the people and as such are paid by taxes collected from the people. Practically all industry has been forced to cut the compensation to its officers and employees and all individual business has been forced to lower profits. Why should Government employees be exempt?

That it is necessary to balance our Budget, namely, equalize our expenses and our revenue, is agreed by every sane thinking person, and if our Nation is to endure and return to prosperity, the quicker this is accomplished the better. Federal employees should be willing to help bring about this balanced condition.

Millions of employees, including our company's, are taking their cut, and if this is to be accomplished with the Government employees our Senators and Representatives must have the moral support of their constituents. If you and the leading citizens of your community or among your acquaintances feel that it is right that Government employees should take a fair reduction in compensation, wire or write and tell your Congressmen. I hope you will individually take this action and will endeavor to get others to do the same. Eight or ten leading men from your community or circle, with a positive declaration in favor of this action, will have great influence. The sooner we meet this situation and face it courageously the sooner we will get back to normal.

Couple your suggestion to your Senators and Representatives with an earnest appeal to refrain from appropriations of all kinds except the normal expense of conducting the Government until such time as this depression passes.

It would be best, of course, to send your message in your own language, but as suggestion you may find in the accompanying sheets something that may assist you in expressing your views. Pick out one, change it to suit you, make it emphatic, and mail it quickly. For your convenience you will find attached a list of Senators and Congressmen from the various States and districts. Address both Senators from your State and the Congressman from your district.

C. E. JOHNSTON.

Mr. NORRIS subsequently said: Mr. President, did the Senator from Louisiana, in having the letter of the president of the railroad printed, ask to have printed also the four different forms? I think he ought to include them in his request and have the forms printed immediately following the letter.

Mr. LONG. I ask to have that done, if I did not before.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood that those forms were sent to the desk together with the letter and that the Senator from Louisiana asked that the whole communication be printed.

Mr. LONG. I do want to have the four forms printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is under the impression that that order was entered.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

The matter referred to is as follows:

I respectfully urge your support for reduction in pay of Government employees. We have taken our cut, and private labor throughout the Nation has done same. Reductions must help taxes to balance the Budget. If you will vote for this and against all appropriations not justified under present distressing conditions we will back you up.

Government employees are servants of the people and are paid out of taxes collected from the people. Employees of practically every industry have had their wages reduced and are taking more. We feel that Government employees should do the same. Their scale of wages has been equal to and in some cases higher than ours, and if they are exempt our representative will be held accountable for it. I hope you will not fail to vote to adjust Government salaries to present-day requirements and that I may depend on you for no appropriation beyond the actual necessities of normal government. We who pay the taxes have more votes than the Government employees, and we and our families are entitled to the same consideration. They should share the burdens of the people, and we will support our representatives in bringing this about.

We all recognize the urgent necessity for quickly balancing our Nation's Budget. Instead of imposing new and increased taxes, the solution of our economic difficulty lies in cutting expenses so as to relieve the tax burden. Activities undertaken in times of prosperity should be discontinued or curtailed, new expenditures should not be permitted, and Federal employees should be compelled to bear their part of the load by taking a cut in pay. The voters have had to do this, and Government employees paid by the people should be treated likewise. Congress should insist that this be done, and I hope that you individually will do everything possible to bring about strict economy in Government expenses.

All labor, except Government, is taking its cut in wages. Railroad employees in every branch voluntarily accepted a 10 per cent cut. I can think of no reason why Government employees, whose hours of labor are few and whose compensation is liberal, should not accept a similar cut in these distressing times. The sentiment in this community is for a wage reduction in all Government departments and no more appropriations except for normal expenses. Your constituents will be back of you in the work you must do to balance the Budget. This will help end the depression.

I do not believe there is any reason why Government employees should be exempt from salary reductions. Every other form of labor—white collar and blue overalls—has taken the cut. Government expenses are very great. Government workers have good pay and easy hours and many other compensations others can not command. There should be an immediate reduction in the pay of all Government employees. This is no more than fair to other forms of labor. Government expenses should be reduced; appropriations should be limited to actual necessities. The situation is serious. You may rest assured that this is the feeling among your constituents here.

The press is full of the efforts of Congress to "balance the Budget." This balancing process has been effected by industry in the only possible way—cutting expenses. My income and the income of practically every other person, except Government employees, has been affected. I urge you, therefore, to use your influence to see that Government forces bear their share of this necessary economy and that you support no appropriations or expenditures that can be avoided.

Texas: Senators MORRIS SHEPPARD and TOM CONNALLY. Representatives WRIGHT PATMAN (Ogden to Bloomburg) and MARTIN DIES (Ruliff to Port Arthur).

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I have sent this letter to the desk to be printed in the RECORD to show that many of the letters we are receiving, so emphatic, from the common people all over the country have been inspired by the railroad presidents, who are urging, as that letter shows, that all their employees should write very emphatic letters to Members of the Congress so as to make sure that Federal wages shall be reduced that the compensation of the employees of the Government shall be lowered.

I have asked that the letter be read in order that Senators and Representatives may understand the inspiration of these letters which are flooding us here, and that they are being directed, as this letter shows, by railroad presidents over the United States.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, along the line just mentioned by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], I think it may interest Members of the Senate to have put into the RECORD a letter from John Haynes Holmes, chairman, and Roger N. Baldwin and Forrest Bailey, directors, of the American Civil Liberties Union, calling upon their friends to help defeat a certain group of bills and do all they can to secure the passage of other bills. That kind of letter has gone out quite widely and resulted in a good many letters being received by Senators and Representatives. I think it may interest Senators to have that letter also printed in the RECORD. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that this letter from the American Civil Liberties Union be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION,
New York City, March, 1932.

To our friends:

We ask your help in putting through Congress certain bills which will help lessen the weapons of repression in the hands of courts and Government officials. With cooperation on the part of all our friends there seems a fair chance for the passage of a substantial part of this program. Pamphlets and leaflets on most of these bills are inclosed. They are:

1. Bills to limit the powers of Federal courts to issue injunctions in labor disputes. Nos. S. 935 and H. R. 5315. Passed by the Senate and may well be passed by the House by the time this reaches our friends.

Backed by the American Federation of Labor, and strangely enough, by the National Civic Federation. Campaign handled by our national committee on labor injunctions. Opposed by the National Manufacturers Association, the Coal Operators Association, the League for Industrial Rights, and other open-shop interests.

2. Bills to admit to citizenship alien conscientious objectors to war who refuse to promise to bear arms. Nos. S. 3275 and H. R. 298.

Backed by the religious press, the Griffin bill committee, Women's International League, National Council for the Prevention of War, and other pacifist organizations. Opposed by all the professional, patriotic, and militarist organizations.

3. To abolish one-man censorship by the Post Office Department by providing jury trials for all matter barred from the mails. S. 3907.

Backed by our National Council on Freedom from Censorship. Opposed by professional vice societies.

4. To prohibit the tapping of telephone wires to obtain evidence in Federal courts. S. 1396, H. R. 5305.

This bill aims to overcome a 5 to 4 Supreme Court decision rendered in a prohibition case. There is, therefore, a tendency to make it a wet and dry measure, which it obviously is not, and for drys to oppose it.

5. To repeal two sections of the war time espionage act, one of which, still in force, gives the Post Office Department power to bar "seditious matter" from the mails; the other is the section under which the war prosecutions for opinion were brought. S. 1058.

This bill passed the Senate unanimously last year. There is no opposition to it.

6. A resolution calling on the President to restore the rights of citizenship to persons convicted under the espionage act during the war for their pacifist utterances. S. J. Res. 43, H. J. Res. 179.

Now, 14 years after the war, they may not serve on juries, vote, or hold office. This bill is opposed by the Attorney General's office, which holds that these rights should be restored individually on application, not by a presidential proclamation. The method advocated by the Attorney General is entirely impracticable.

The pamphlets and leaflets inclosed cover all of the above except 5 and 6. Information on those issues will be sent to anyone on request.

We call on our friends to help defeat one group of bills of which there seems to be considerable danger of passage. They provide for the registration of all aliens. A pamphlet describing the bills and stating the arguments against them will be sent on request. Write to your Senators and Representatives opposing the passage of any bill whatever providing for registration.

These bills are backed in principle by the President, the Department of Labor, and the professional patriotic organizations. The American Federation of Labor, which once opposed them, can not be counted on now. They are opposed by all of the religious press, and by the foreign-language groups of naturalized citizens.

We ask you now to write letters to your Senators and Representatives urging the passage of any or all of these bills. Back those which especially interest you. Make the letters short, four or five lines only. Each letter should deal with one bill only. Mention it by number. If you write one Senator or Representative on several bills, space your letters a few days apart.

Letters to legislators always help if they come from their home districts. You will note by the opposition to the bills cited above that only the strongest possible expression of support from all our friends will put these bills through.

Also if you have time, write brief letters to your local newspapers in support of any of the bills; get organizations to adopt resolutions supporting them.

Please do your part promptly, backing up the effort we are making directly in Washington. If you are willing to help further, fill out and return the inclosed card.

With appreciation, sincerely yours,

JOHN HAYNES HOLMES,
Chairman.

ROGER N. BALDWIN,
FORREST BAILEY, Directors.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to make a short statement with reference to the letter just read from the president of the Southern Railroad, asking for reduction of wages. If the Senator from Oregon will not object, I shall take only about a minute and a half.

Mr. McNARY. I shall object unless we have some idea of the time the Senator desires to take. Does the Senator want just a few minutes?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If I may have two minutes, that will be all I shall want.

Mr. McNARY. Very well.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I think it comes with poor grace for those who represent the railroads and the banks now to come and talk about the deficit. Five hundred million dollars has been appropriated out of the Federal Treasury to help the banks and the railroads. They were helped again when we canceled the foreign debts, which were bringing in $500,000,000 a year. That represents an extraordinary expenditure of a billion dollars out of appropriations this year.

They were helped again with the moratorium, which cost us $250,000,000, to help the banks of New York and London. Now they come passing the hat to collect from the working people of this country to make good the deficit that was caused by appropriations made at their request, made, in a way, as a result of threats of national and international disaster unless these doles were taken out of the Treasury and handed to them.

Working people all over the country are expected to donate to make up the deficit, and I expect they will have to donate, but I think it comes with very poor grace for the presidents of railroad corporations and banks, after having received all they asked for at the hands of this Congress, to come now and repeat and repeat and repeat that the great mass of the people shall now be compelled to contribute to the hat that is being passed to make up the existing deficit. The railroad executives and bankers have dominated this Government more than any other influence. The results of this domination make further advice from them seem effrontery.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I merely desire to say to the Senator from Minnesota that the communication which I just sent up to the desk contains form letters which the employees are to use. Those in authority wrote out several different forms that are to be used; and if Senators will notice the letters they are receiving, they will find that they track the words of these railroad executives, who came here and got the better part of $2,000,000,000 of Government money and are using their time and the Government money to send out form letters to their employees to urge Congress to press down the wages of Federal employees.

ALABAMA SENATORIAL CONTEST

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the unanimous-consent agreement previously entered into, the Chair lays before the Senate the resolution (S. Res. 199) relating to the Alabama senatorial contest.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 199), reported by Mr. GEORGE and Mr. BRATTON from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as follows:

Resolved, That JOHN H. BANKHEAD is hereby declared to be a duly elected Senator of the United States from the State of Alabama for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1931, and is entitled to a seat as such.

Mr. HASTINGS obtained the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to make a request for unanimous consent in order that we might pass a resolution. It will require unanimous consent, because we are going on with the resolution to which the Senator from Delaware is about to address himself under a unanimous-consent agreement.

Some time ago the Judiciary Committee reported a resolution introduced by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING], asking for some action in regard to the pamphlets in the Mooney-Billings case. The Judiciary Committee reported recommending that the pamphlets be printed as a public document.

It was said that there was an attempt to influence the governor of the State, who had the application for pardon under consideration. That application has now been disposed of, and so far as I understand, no further objection exists to the action requested in the resolution.

I wanted to ask unanimous consent that the resolution reported by the Judiciary Committee be passed.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I was among the members of the Committee on the Judiciary who filed a minority report in that matter, and I shall feel compelled to object to taking up the resolution now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield to me?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Costigan	Kean	Schall
Austin	Couzens	Kendrick	Sheppard
Bailey	Cutting	La Follette	Shipstead
Bankhead	Dickinson	Lewis	Shortridge
Barbour	Dill	Logan	Smith

Byrnes	Hayden	Oddie	Walcott
Capper	Hebert	Patterson	Waterman
Caraway	Howell	Pittman	Watson
Carey	Hull	Reed	Wheeler
Copeland	Jones	Robinson, Ind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-two Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, in the report submitted by the majority members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections with respect to the primary it is said:

In our opinion the legality of the primary is not a proper matter for the consideration of the Senate of the United States. If it were, under the facts in this case, the action of the people in the general election has foreclosed consideration of it. For the fraud and corruption of the successful candidate in the election of the Senate may go into the primary, as was done in Smith's case and Vare's case. Here the alleged infirmity is in the action of the party committee, not in Mr. Bankhead.

After having read that report and with practically nothing having been said with respect to the validity of the primary, I had supposed that the Senators filing the report were depending entirely upon that statement in their report. Great stress was laid, however, by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] yesterday upon the fact that the 1928 restrictions which were placed upon the candidates were not unusual and that similar provisions had been made since the year 1910.

The provision in section 612 of the statute, which makes it necessary from my point of view that the same restrictions be placed upon the voter as are placed upon the candidate, was placed there in the year 1919. It was contended and not denied that the words "for each candidate" were placed in the statute in that year and that the statute was so amended in order that the costs of the primary might be paid out of public funds, a decision of the State of Texas upon a similar statute having held to the contrary. It is not necessary, therefore, to inquire what the practice was prior to 1919. Indeed, I do not think the practice would be controlling in any event, but it might be worth while to find out whether the statement made by Mr. Bankhead with respect to this is entirely correct.

I can readily understand how the Senator from New Mexico may have overlooked things in the record with respect to this, because in part 3 of the hearings, where this evidence appeared, it is not in chronological order, but the different years are on different pages in the record. The 1920 primary resolution, for instance, appears on page 352. That was dated January 30, 1920, beginning on page 351 and passing over to page 352, and the language is this:

Third. Whereas there are a large number of citizens in Alabama who will be qualified for the first time to participate in the coming primary election, many of whom have recently offered their lives in the service of their country; and

Whereas the Democratic Party of Alabama wishes to invite within its folds all of these new voters and any others who may become qualified before the date of holding the primary election: Therefore we hereby extend an invitation to all qualified white voters of the State of Alabama, and those who may become qualified by that time, who believe in the principles of the Democratic Party, to participate in the said primaries, and this shall be the only qualification required for the participation of qualified electors in said primary.

Fourth. On or before the 10th day of March, 1920, all persons desiring to have their names placed upon the ballots as candidates to be nominated for State offices and all other offices to be filled by the votes of more than one county shall file with the chairman of the Democratic State executive committee a certificate or statement that he is a candidate for such office; and all persons desiring their names placed upon the ballots as candidates for nomination for any county or precinct offices shall file with the chairman of the county executive committee a statement that he is a candidate for such office, which statement shall be so filed on or before the 10th day of March, 1920, and his assessment, if any, as fixed by the State committee paid, and all declarations of such candidates shall contain the statement that he will abide by the results of the primary and will support the nominees of the party.

There is nothing in the 1920 resolution that contains any provision that placed any restrictions upon the qualifications of the candidates. In 1922, appearing on page 346 of part 3 of the hearings, it was provided:

3. That all candidates for any of the offices or party places to be nominated in said primary shall qualify as such candidates on or before the 1st day of May, 1922, by filing, if a candidate for a State office or a State party office, his or her name with the chairman of this committee, and if a candidate for a county office or county party office, his or her name with the chairman of his or her county Democratic executive committee, designating the office or the place for which he or she is a candidate, and under oath declaring that he or she did not in the presidential election of 1920, support the presidential electors of any party other than the Democratic Party, and a declaration that he or she will be bound by the result of such primary and will support the nominees thereof.

A little later in the same year, as appears on pages 352 and 353 of the hearings, the executive committee passed this resolution:

Resolved, That where any such person has made a bona fide effort to comply with the party's requirements as evidenced by his having filed with some party authority, State or county, or with the secretary of state, or with the probate judge of his county, by or before April 1, 1922, a statement in writing declaring his candidacy, and in substance declaring that he is a Democrat, shall be and is, entitled to file such additional statement—

And so forth.

It seems that in 1922, the resolution dated April 28, the other having been dated January 13, qualifies, or intends to qualify, at any rate, the original statement that nobody could be a candidate unless he has voted the Democratic ticket.

In 1924, appearing on page 347 of the hearings, the whole matter was referred to the executive committee. In 1926 appearing on page 348 there was the same provision as in 1922, to wit:

Who did not in the last preceding election support the nominee or candidate of any party except the Democratic Party.

There is no such provision in the resolution of 1928 which appears at page 353:

That any white Democratic voter upon any qualifications fixed by this committee, or county committee if a candidate for a county office, may become a candidate in said primary election as follows.

Then it goes on to state the details that shall be covered. In 1930, which is the resolution under consideration, there was this provision:

3. The following persons, and none other, shall be eligible to be candidates for nomination in said primary election, viz:

Qualified white electors who possess the qualifications fixed by law for the respective offices for which they are candidates for nomination: Provided, however, That no person shall become a candidate for any State, district, Federal, or circuit office, or have his or her name printed upon the Democratic ballot in the primary election to be held on the 12th day of August, 1930, if such person either voted a Republican presidential ticket in November, 1928, or openly and publicly opposed the election of the nominees of the Democratic Party, or either of them, or who opposed the election of the Democratic electors for President or Vice President in November, 1928. Such proposed candidates shall also be required to pay the assessments fixed by this committee on or before the date limited for paying such assessments, and for the filing of declaration of their candidacy.

That appears on page 349 of the hearings.

Under date of December 16, 1931, in the resolution providing for the 1932 primaries, appearing at page 350 of the hearings, the following provision appears:

4. That the following persons shall be entitled to vote in said primary elections, and none others, namely: Qualified white electors in this State who believe in the principles of the Democratic Party and who agree and bind themselves by participating in said primary to abide by the result of said primary elections and to support the nominees of the Democratic Party therein.

The following persons, and none others, shall be eligible to be candidates for nomination or election in said primary election, namely: Qualified white electors who possess the qualifications fixed by law for the respective offices for which they are candidates for nomination or election: Provided, however, That no person shall become a candidate for any State, district, circuit, Federal, county, or party office, or have his or her name printed upon the Democratic ballot in said primary elections, if such person voted a Republican ticket or any independent ticket or the ticket of any other party or group other than the nominees of the Democratic Party or the Democratic ticket in the general election held on November 4, 1930, or openly and publicly opposed the election of the nominees of the Democratic Party or any of them in the general election held on November 4, 1930.

The call for the 1932 primaries is very similar to that of 1930, but I invite attention to the fact that in the meantime in the month of February, 1931, and before this last resolution of the executive committee of the Democratic Party was adopted, on February 25, 1931, the State of Alabama modified this very law by putting in the following language:

And the qualifications of elector entitled to vote in such primary election shall not necessarily be the same as the qualifications for electors to become candidates therein.

In other words they undertook by legislation in 1931 to do what the executive committee in 1930 did without legislation.

Senator Bankhead insists that this has been the practice in Alabama since 1910, but, as I have shown by reading these records, in 1920 there was no such provision; in 1922 it was qualified by subsequent resolution; in 1924 it was submitted to the committee, and there is no record as to what was done; in 1926 they did have in some restriction; in 1928 they had none; and in 1931 they had the one about which complaint is made.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEBERT in the chair). Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. A court decision was read yesterday by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON]. I wish to inquire if the statute had been amended before the supreme court rendered that decision, or was the decision rendered prior to the amendment of 1931?

Mr. HASTINGS. The decision was rendered before the amendment was adopted. I shall come to that decision in a few moments.

But with respect to what was the practice, I invite attention to the fact that in the report of the minority views at page 31 is a statement alleged to have been made, and it appeared all through the papers and I suppose there is no dispute about it, by the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], who ought to have been, and I assume was, familiar with the practice in Alabama, as was Senator Bankhead. This is what Senator BLACK said:

A study of the resolution—

He had reference to the resolution with these restrictions in it—

A study of the resolution convinces me the majority has acted in contravention of existing laws and statutes. The committee, in my judgment, has no legal authority to adopt one rule of qualifications for voters in the primary and another rule of qualifications for candidates in that primary. The rule must be uniform with reference to both.

The law does not contemplate a special privileged class to run for office and a subordinate class who can vote but not hold office. Citizenship carries with it the right of an elector to vote and hold office. An attempt to abridge the sacred rights of citizenship is fundamentally un-American.

If a citizen is barred as a candidate for political office as party punishment, he must be barred as a voter. If barred as a voter, he must be barred as a candidate. This is clearly provided in section 612 of the Alabama Code of 1923, limiting the authority of the committee on this subject, as follows:

"All persons who are qualified electors under the general election laws of this State shall have the right to participate in such primary elections, subject to such political or other qualifications as may be prescribed for its candidates."

This law is not ambiguous. It is plain. It means what it says. A rule which bars a candidate bars a voter, and vice versa. The Alabama Legislature evidently intended to protect ancient constitutional liberties and privileges and prevent any small group from perpetuating a favored officeholding class over and above the average man. The committee did not wish to bar as voters those who failed to vote for Governor Smith. It is clear, however, that they have barred thousands as voters if they have barred them as candidates. The courts should not be called upon to settle a question upon which there can be no reasonable grounds for disagreement. It is a situation which calls for the best thought and action of all Democrats who respect the ancient rights of citizenship and who love the traditions and principles of the Democratic Party.

I want to take up for a few moments the Lett case, which it is contended by the Senator from New Mexico is a decision by the courts of Alabama upon this subject; and I want to call particular attention to the distinction between the provision of the resolution adopted by the Republican Party and that which I have just read of the Democratic Party. The court says:

The Chilton County Republican executive committee called a primary election to be held "with the State primary election on August 12, 1930." In the call resolution all qualified voters, regardless of past party affiliations and who believe in the principles of the Republican Party and pledge themselves to support the nominees of such party in the primary, were invited to participate. But as to one desiring to become a candidate there was an additional requirement that he state "under oath how he or she voted in the last general election of 1928; that is, whether said proposed candidate supported the Republican ticket or the Democratic ticket or voted a split ticket."

It will be observed that in that connection there is a very great distinction between the two cases. In the Lett case an individual is not barred from being a candidate at all; he is merely required to state, for the information of the voter, how he voted. He is required to state that in an affidavit, for the benefit of those persons who want to look at the record when they go to the primary to ascertain for what particular kind of Republican they are voting.

It is not so in this case. In this case all persons who did not vote for the party candidates at the previous election were absolutely barred from participating in the primary; they had no right to put their names before the electorate; they could not get their names on the ballot if it were a fact—and there was no method provided to determine the fact—that they had voted for the candidates of some other party at a certain other time.

It is said that this question can not be raised, because the law provides in many cases that it is necessary for some action to be taken by the person contesting before he can raise this point. This identical question was raised, however, in the Supreme Court of Alabama, and Mr. Justice Thomas, one of the justices, rendered a dissenting opinion. I said it "was raised." I do not mean by that that Mr. Heflin was a party complainant, but the identical facts were brought to the court's attention by some other applicant or petitioner. On page 31 of the minority views this is what Judge Thomas says with respect to it—

That the statute is plain and unambiguous; it is its own interpreter, and expresses the legislative intent. Wilkerson v. Lane (181 Ala. 646, 62 So. 31). The intent and expressed purpose of the legislature are found in the use of the words "for its candidates" after the words "political party." This was the requirement for the one standard of party loyalty and affiliation for all who participated in the primary as electors and as candidates. In this requirement the due right to vote and participate in such primary election of a political party is not denied on grounds made the subject of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Federal Constitution.

(1) The statute, as required to be applied in section 612, Code, to electors and candidates alike, was applied by the resolution to the election of candidates for Federal, State, district, circuit offices, and State executive committees, and officers to be elected by the vote of a single county for a uniform and single test of party affiliation and loyalty for all electors; (2) a different test of party affiliation and loyalty is prescribed and required of candidates who stand for election to office for Federal, State, district, circuit, or State committeemen; different from that prescribed for all electors in party primary; (3) and different test from that permitted (with limitations) to exaction by county executive committee or candidates for county office to be filled by the "votes of a single county."

It follows from this material departure in the resolution from the requirements of law that the primary election called is not the kind of primary that may be held under the law, and at public expense in the State of Alabama.

I might say in connection with that case that the majority opinion of the court reached no conclusion at all with respect to the merits of this law, but held that it was not a case of equity for the equity court, and, therefore, refused to take jurisdiction of it; so that in the one application made to test this question in the courts of Alabama the courts of Alabama refused to take jurisdiction of the case, and it has never been legally decided.

I have pointed out that the Lett case is not only not controlling, it is not even persuasive, in determining this question, because it involves a wholly different question; it only went so far as to hold that the executive committee of a political party had some right under the statute of fixing the qualifications for electors.

In the minority views, on page 32, will be found the following touching this subject:

The governing body of a political party may prescribe the "political or other qualifications" of the qualified voters who may participate in the primaries of such party, and the candidates who may be named by it, and these shall be the same for both voter and candidate. The committee may decide whether the proposed candidate comes within the rules which it has adopted. It may decide more or less arbitrarily that he does not and, therefore, refuse to permit his name to be printed on the ballot. Such committee has the final decision and no court can properly review it. A somewhat similar rule applies to the voter. The voter appears at the polling place to cast his vote at a primary and he is challenged upon the ground that although he is a qualified voter he does not meet the political qualifications set up by the committee and, therefore, has no right to vote therein. If the election officers decide against him he can have no relief. In other words, the committee decides whether the proposed candidate comes within the definition it has set up for party allegiance, and the election officers make the same decision when the voter attempts to cast his ballot.

The committee of the Democratic Party in Alabama elected to hold a primary. Under the law such primary was to be held at public expense and to be regulated as the law prescribes. To say that all qualified electors had a right to vote at said primary is to take away from the Democratic Party the right to require a loyalty and allegiance to the party as a condition to the right to participate. It opens the door for qualified electors who are not loyal to the party to dictate the nominations. Section 612 of the Alabama Code specifically gives to the committee the right to prescribe for the qualified voter political qualifications. It could with propriety have prescribed for the voter the same qualifications it did for the candidate, namely, that no person shall be permitted to vote at said primary "if such person either voted a Republican presidential ticket in November, 1928, or openly or publicly opposed the election of the nominee, or either of them, of the Democratic convention held at Houston, Tex., in 1928, or who opposed the election of Democratic electors for President or Vice President in November, 1928." If the committee wanted to punish the voter for leaving his party in 1928, it had a perfect right to do so. Party management is entitled to insist upon party loyalty from those who desire to participate in purely party matters.

It is not permitted, however, under the Alabama law to apply one rule to the voter and another rule to the person who desires to be a candidate. The committee resolution shows clearly what a majority of the committee sought to do. It hoped to bring back into the party the voter who for one reason or another deserted it in 1928; it hoped at the same time to punish prospective candidates who had probably taken an active part in leading the voters in such desertion. In other words, pure party selfishness would suggest extending an invitation to the voter who had left his or her party in 1928 to return in 1930. He had something, to wit, a vote, that the party wanted. But it was, naturally, a very different thing when a person who had deserted his party in 1928 appeared in 1930 seeking party honors. It is not surprising that the committee should desire to find some way to prevent the success of such candidate.

But it seems to me the very object of section 612 of the code was to prevent this very thing. The legislature sought to put the voter and candidate in the same class and subject to the same restrictions as to their party loyalty or allegiance, and it was not within the power of the committee to make fish of one and fowl of the other.

Reading from page 34, here is what Mr. Bankhead's counsel said with respect to it:

> The true construction of the statute, however, is plain. Under its terms "all qualified electors under the general election laws of this State shall have the right to participate in such primary elections, subject to such political or other qualifications as may be prescribed by the State executive committee or governing body of such political party for its candidate." (Italics supplied.)
> The italicized portions of this statute simply mean that those qualified electors under the general election laws of the State, who accept the political or other qualifications fixed by the governing body of the party for its candidates, may enter the primary in which those candidates run. They have not the right to enter the primary if they do so as rebels against the action of the committee in fixing the qualifications of candidates. If they are willing to accept the qualifications for candidates, which the law gives the governing body of the party the authority to fix, and are qualified electors, then they have the right to enter the primary. The statute gives the governing body of the party the authority to fix qualifications for candidates, and requires those who wish to enter the primary to obey the exercise of that authority. If a member of the party chooses to come into the primary, he enters whether as voter or as candidate, subject to the action of the committee in respect to the qualifications, political and otherwise, prescribed for candidates. He must respect and acquiesce in this action both as voter and as candidate.

Commenting on that language used by counsel for Mr. Bankhead, the views of the minority proceed:

> The above quotation was used in the brief upon another point, but it applies particularly to the convention made that no complaint can be made if the rights of the voters have been enlarged. The language used emphasizes the fact that section 612 meant to confine the persons having a right to vote to those "who accept the political or other qualifications fixed by the governing body of the party for its candidates." Again, "If they are willing to accept the qualifications for candidates, which the law gives the governing body of the party the authority to fix, and are qualified electors, then they have a right to enter the primary."
> I can not escape the conviction that counsel for Mr. Bankhead has thoroughly justified the opinion I have reached. His interpretation of section 612, in this respect, if I fully understand him, is not very different from my own.

That statement was filed with the views of the minority some time ago, and there has been no comment upon it, so far as I know, by counsel for Mr. Bankhead.

Before leaving that subject, and in order that the Senate may have all the facts, I desire to call attention to this fact, which seems to me to be a matter of interest.

Since this question was raised, the Legislature of the State of Alabama passed a new primary law for that State, which was approved by the governor on February 25, 1931. I say "a new law." This particular section of it was new. The important part of the section is as follows:

> And the qualifications of electors entitled to vote in such primary election shall not necessarily be the same as the qualifications for electors entitled to become candidates therein.

In other words, if it be true, as is contended, that this primary was in all sense legal, why should it be necessary for the legislature to follow it up in 1931, after the question was raised, and specifically to state the thing that they ought to have stated before if they wanted it interpreted in any such way as that? I think it is an interpretation of their own laws from which there is no reasonable escape.

The majority of the committee makes a distinction between the Senate's right to look into this primary, or to have anything to do with it, and the Smith and Vare cases, upon this theory (p. 8 of the majority report):

> For the fraud and corruption of the successful candidate in the election the Senate may go into the primary, as was done in Smith's case and Vare's case. Here the alleged infirmity is in the action of the party committee, not in Mr. Bankhead.

I may not understand those cases as some Senators who were here at the time understand them, but it is stated generally that the Senate went into those primaries and declared them illegal because of fraud. The only reason why a thing is declared illegal because of fraud is because the fraud itself vitiates what otherwise would be legal. That is the only reason why we provide that fraud shall vitiate it. Fraud vitiates a thing which otherwise would be legal. If you have something that is illegal upon its face without any fraud, how can you possibly make a distinction between the two?

The Senate takes upon itself the responsibility of examining into a primary because there is an allegation of fraud. If fraud is proved, the Senate has held that there was no legal primary; but if it comes to a case where, upon the face of the resolution itself calling for the primary, it be admitted or can be shown conclusively, as I contend it is shown in this case, that it was of itself illegal, then certainly it is impossible to make any distinction between the two.

It may be said, and the Senator from New Mexico undertook to defend the Senator from Alabama upon that point, that he had no responsibility in connection with it, and did nothing to strengthen the position taken by his committee, and was not required to do anything that would cause the committee to repudiate what it had done. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] called attention to the fact that in the hearings Mr. Bankhead said that he had given out a newspaper interview saying that he was not in favor of helping a man who had gone back on his party; but that, so far as he was concerned, he was perfectly willing to have the primary thrown open to the world and let all people come in who wanted to come in and participate in it; and for that reason the Senator contends that it is impossible to attach to Mr. Bankhead any blame for the existence of this resolution on the day of the primary. It appears in the record, however, and is in the minority report, on page 6:

> Prior to the passage of this law in 1931, the Democratic executive committee of Alabama by resolution deliberately prescribed qualifications which excluded Mr. Heflin from participating in the primary. It appears from the record that a member of the State executive committee as early as December 21, 1929, directed a letter to Mr. Bankhead making certain inquiries of him, relative to his position in this matter. This was done by an exchange of letters, the important questions and answers being as follows:
> "1. Are you willing to join in a request "—

This was a member of the State executive committee.

> "Are you willing to join in a request that the State committee rescind that action and remove the restriction that was intended to keep the name of Senator Heflin and Judge Locke off the ballot?"
> Mr. Bankhead's answer was that he would not.
> "2. If the committee refuses to comply with such request, do you favor the voters in the primary being given an opportunity to stamp the names of Heflin and Locke on the ballot and vote for them if they want to do so?"
> Mr. Bankhead's answer was:
> "I shall not be a party to such a thing."
> "3. If the voter should write or stamp the names of Heflin and Locke on the ballots and vote for them, do you favor Heflin being declared the Democratic nominee for Senator, if he should get more votes in the primary than any other candidate; and would you, in that event, refuse to allow your name certified as the nominee?"
> Mr. Bankhead's answer was:
> "I will do nothing, directly or indirectly, which may tend in any way to weaken or evade the action taken by our party in fixing the qualifications of candidates."

May I call the attention of the Senate to this very important fact in that connection: The Senator from New Mexico said that Mr. Bankhead was in no sense responsible for the resolution; it was the committee's action, and after the committee had acted upon it he refused in any way to interfere. I call your attention, however, to the very important fact appearing in this record and a thing that throughout the discussion must be remembered, that, according to Mr. Bankhead's own statement to the committee, in 60 out of the 67 counties the probate judges who conducted the election were partisans of Mr. Bankhead. I think it may be reasonably argued that if that be true with respect to the probate judges, he was in control of the executive committee of the Democratic Party in Alabama to an equal extent. I do not know whether that is true or not, but I assume that if he was in control of one, he was in reasonable control of the other.

Another thing that ought to be borne in mind in this connection is that the executive committee not only prescribed these qualifications but they announced that the voters in Alabama would not be permitted to name Heflin and Locke by writing in their names and thereby have them declared nominated by getting a majority of the votes of the voters of Alabama.

I have selected some quotations from expressions made in the Senate upon these questions; and I do this in answer to the committee's report that the Senate has nothing to do with the matter, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, for the purpose of showing to what extent the Senate in the past has believed it had a right to inquire.

I read from part 3 of the hearings, page 308:

Mr. Reed of Missouri—

In the Smith contest—

Mr. REED of Missouri. They [frauds in the primary] did not make him incapable of election to the United States Senate, but they made it improper for him to sit in the United States Senate, because one of the steps by which he secured his election was through improper methods used to get on the ticket.

Not fraud; "improper methods used to get on the ticket."

Again, somebody made an inquiry, and Senator Reed continued:

I am going to give the Senator my opinion and give it to him very plainly. Does the Senator mean to say that if a man, by any kind of fraud or corruption, can get his name upon the ticket, and if thereafter he is elected, he is entitled to take his seat, although he never could have been upon the ticket except for that fraud and corruption, and that the vote of the people is final and conclusive, regardless of any fraud, chicanery, or corruption which may have been committed; does the Senator take that position? * * * I hold to the view that whenever any material step which a candidate for office takes in order to secure a seat in this body is a corrupt step, materially affecting the result, * * * it is the duty of the Senate in protection of the country to say that that kind of fraud and corruption vitiates the election. That is my view. To take the view that if a man can, by bribery, by fraud, by corruption, by any kind of villainy, get his name printed upon a party ticket so that, although there may be great numbers of the people who vote their protests, yet in the general sweep of the election he is carried over with the tide he must thereafter be seated, is to open the door to every kind of fraud and iniquity; it is to say to every scoundrel who is at large, "All you have to do is by some means to get upon a ticket in a State that is largely Democratic or largely Republican and then by virtue of the very fraud which gave you that position you can finally land here and there is no power to prevent it." If that is the case, then the Senate is defenseless and rogues may as well begin their nefarious business in the open.

The following question was asked Senator Reed:

The Senator will not attach any importance, then, to the action of the people of Illinois, who knew all about this election, just as much as the Senator from Missouri knows, and, nevertheless, chose to elect Frank Smith to the Senate?

Senator Reed replied:

I would not attach the slightest importance to the fact that in a party-ridden State a political machine was able to put over a candidate even though he was covered all over with the leprosy of crime, if when he came here, one of the steps he took was in the teeth of the law, in the teeth of morals, and in violation of the statutes of his own State, which is the case here.

He was talking about the Illinois case.

No vote thereafter taken by the people can cleanse the act of its fraud and its iniquity if it be an act which contributed to the bringing of the individual here to the Senate. More than that, there are other States in the Union that have some rights; for when a Senator comes here from Illinois he becomes a Senator of the United States, and he is as much a Senator for each of the 48 States as he is for the State that sent him here, and his vote binds all of the States. Therefore, these other States have the right to say that no matter what the vote may have been in a particular State, if the individual coming here does not come along the road of the law, walking it straight, and coming here without taint upon his office, they will refuse to allow him to sit here and bind the sovereign people of this Republic. Any other view than that means that fraud can walk in the noonday; that corrupt organizations can defeat any chance at fair elections and that every kind of iniquity and every sort of villainy will triumph, provided by some means a majority of votes can be gotten into a ballot box. That is not good morals; it is not good law.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] said:

I am moved to advert to a theory advanced in the course of debate yesterday * * * that however tainted with corruption the nomination of a candidate for the Senate may be, * * * the facts being published during the campaign and thus brought to the notice of the electors of the State, who, nevertheless, give him a plurality of votes cast, his election is unimpeachable and he must be seated * * *. The proposition thus advanced scarcely requires refutation. Baldly stated, as it was on this floor, it is too shocking for acceptance.

* * * The Australian ballot system necessarily ties the primary to the ultimate election and makes them both equally a part of the machinery of the choice. But whether the Congress may or may not legislate with respect to primaries, it can inquire and ought to inquire, whether in any of the steps leading to the ultimate choice, the claimant or his supporters have resorted to corruption, and to reject him if in its opinion he has. * * *

What is the difference to the people of my State whether one claiming to be elected to the Senate from another secured his election by bribing his constituency in the primary or bribing them in the final election? If Congress can not legislate to insure purity in primaries, there is all the more reason why the Senate should exclude a claimant whose election is tainted with fraud perpetrated in the primaries.

Senator BORAH said on the same occasion:

It has been contended, and it is still contended, that the primary is so detached and distinguished from the election that it can have no bearing on the validity of the election and could not be regarded, even if corruption has tainted the title growing out of the election. With that proposition, Mr. President, I am wholly unable to agree.

This colloquy occurred:

Senator KENYON, of Iowa. Mr. President, if, as a legal proposition, anybody can do anything in the primary, * * * and the Senate can not inquire into it, of course, that is the end of this case * * *.

Mr. KING. If the Senate could inquire into expenditures made by Senator Stephenson, regardless of the fact that they were made in a primary, or even if they were not, why may we not inquire into expenditures made in a primary or anterior to a primary, with a view to determining whether or not the conduct of the Senator is such as to justify his retention in the Senate of the United States?

Mr. KENYON. I say we can.

Mr. KING. Undoubtedly.

Mr. President, I do not want to take up any more time on the question of the primary. When the matter was first brought up in the subcommittee the subcommittee insisted that it did not want to inquire into the primary; but counsel insisted upon being heard, and then they raised this very important question as to the legality of the primary itself, the very foundation for the election, and members of the subcommittee, knowing that there was a division in the Senate with respect to that subject, but knowing how very greatly interested some Senators were upon the subject and what a conviction they had as to the right and the duty to go into the primary, believed it important to go into that question. They heard the arguments on both sides, reported to the full committee, and the matter is now before the Senate, together with other objections to the election.

Mr. President, it is rather difficult for me to state at all briefly the facts in this case with which I think the Senate ought to be familiar before passing upon the question. On yesterday the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] discussed the failure to provide polling booths in Alabama as provided by law. The law provides that in towns of 3,000 inhabitants or more there shall be a private booth for each individual voter at the time he votes. The Senator from New Mexico laid great stress upon the fact that counsel for Mr. Bankhead, a gentleman some 50 years of age, stated that he had always lived in Alabama, and that during that time he had never seen such a booth on election day. The Senator, in his argument, cites other instances to show that in Alabama it was not the custom to have these booths.

I think the Senator called attention to the fact that some court decided that it was not a matter that was controlling; that it was not a thing which could not be avoided if there was a desire to avoid it. My attention has been called to the fact that that decision was rendered before the present law went into effect. But whether that would control or not is, in my judgment, beside the point.

I can not quite understand how it is possible to defend this case, and to defend Senator Bankhead's right to a seat upon the floor of the Senate, upon the theory that the people in Alabama have been accustomed to violate the law on election day. If that be true, and if that be a good defense here, then it is hardly worth while to bring to the Senate any case from Alabama at all unless we are able to find enough men who have seen enough ballots taken out to change the result.

I think the distinction is to be found in the fact that the matter has never been brought to the floor of the United States Senate when some question has been raised as to the legality of some election in the State of Alabama. It must be true that some time and somewhere the people of Alabama are entitled to have the question passed upon as to whether the violations of law on election day, which have been so flagrant, can pass without punishment to anybody, and that the person who claims to be elected, whether it be governor or Representative or Senator, shall at no time have any question regarding the election passed upon, but shall be able to depend upon the old cry that, "This has been our practice in Alabama for 25 years."

I shall call attention to various sections of the statute which have been violated, but before doing so I want to answer the argument made by the Senator from New Mexico yesterday, where he stressed the fact that it was not necessary for the election officers to sign the oath. I read from the argument of the Senator from New Mexico as it appears on page 8588 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> The chairman of the subcommittee, who speaks for the minority, suggests in his report, filed to-day, that some of the election officers failed to subscribe to an oath. I think he says that 544 of them failed to subscribe to an oath. The statute does not require them to subscribe to an oath. The language of the statute is that they shall take an oath. Of course, that statute could be fully complied with by the election officers standing before the polls opened and holding up their right hands and taking the oath verbally. The statute does not provide they shall sign an oath. Failure to file a written oath does not indicate a failure to comply with the statute. There is not a thing in the record to indicate that a single one of them failed to take the oath, which could be done verbally.

I am a little surprised that the Senator should have been so emphatic with respect to that one violation of the law, which is less important than most of the violations to which I shall call the Senate's attention. But I want to answer that suggestion by reading the whole provision of the law in respect to that matter.

> SEC. 459. Oaths of election officers. Before entering upon their duties, inspectors and clerks must take an oath to perform their duties at the election according to law, and such oath may be administered by any person authorized by law to administer oaths, or by any one of the inspectors.

The distinguished Senator undertakes to defend the failure to sign the oath upon the theory that those officials are not required to sign anything, that they are merely required to take the oath. In order that we may know that that is not an unfamiliar provision of law, and what the practice is everywhere with respect to it, I call attention to the requirement in the Federal Consitution of an oath on the part of the President of the United States, which is as follows:

> Before he enter on the execution of his office, he shall take the following oath or affirmation—

And so on.

In every provision of the law where anything is said about taking an oath, it is generally in exactly that language. But what do we need in order to find out whether or not a person has taken an oath? We need some evidence of it somewhere, and for that reason the President of the United States subscribes to an oath, so that there may be a record made of the fact that he did take an oath.

I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that in all the papers furnished by the election officials of Alabama the oath of election officers is provided on the back of the sheet. It reads:

> We—
> Naming them—
> the inspectors appointed to act at a general election to be held in Covington County, in the State of Alabama, on this day, do solemnly swear that we will perform our duties as such inspectors according to law.

There is room for their signatures, all three of them. Then under that is this:

> Sworn to and subscribed before me this ——— day of ——— 19—.

And there is room for the name of the officer administering the oath.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I have been listening very closely to the Senator's argument. However, the same provision the Senator has read also applies to governors of States. I know that in my own State an oath is never subscribed. In taking the oath of office as governor I was sworn in by the chief justice of the State, but there was no oath subscribed. It is surprising to me to find that in that State there was never an oath subscribed by a governor who was sworn in. The governor was merely required to take an oath, which he did, publicly or privately, and there has never been a record made of an oath taken by a governor.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I am willing to admit the proposition that it is not necessary for them to subscribe to the oath in order that they may have been legally elected officers and in a position to perform the duties of the particular office; I am ready to admit that; but the practice in Alabama, upon which the Senator from New Mexico depended so very much, is that these things are subscribed, and it is the only practical way, of course, to find out whether an oath was taken. I have no doubt, knowing as I do the thousands of violations of law in Alabama, that this oath was not administered in most instances. At any rate, in many instances to which I have called attention it was not administered.

I want to take up those sections and call the attention of the Senate to the violations. But before doing that and in order that we may have in mind what they are like, I shall read from the brief that was filed on behalf of Mr. Heflin and which was not answered and not replied to on behalf of Mr. Bankhead; in other words, Mr. Bankhead did not reply to this argument at all and did not reply to this brief.

My record shows a little differently from this, but I think, in order that the Senate may know at the outset how serious are these violations, it is worth while for me to read this statement. It appears on page 395 of the hearings, part 3:

> The record shows that the following propositions have been established in this contest:
> 1. The Democratic primary in Alabama in 1930 was illegal and unlawful, and Mr. Bankhead's alleged nomination was null and void.
> 2. Mr. Bankhead refused to do anything which would tend in any way to correct the illegal action taken by the Democratic State executive committee after he had been informed by Senator Black and other competent lawyers who supported him that the action of the committee was unlawful and that any nomination coming from the proposed primary would be null and void.
> 3. The statement filed by Mr. Bankhead of his expenses during the primary did not comply with the Alabama law, and under that law he was not entitled to have his name placed on the ticket in the general election.

I forgot a moment ago to invite the attention of the Senate to something else, for whatever it may be worth. I wish to recur to the report filed by the minority. On page 5 appears this statement:

> Section 593 of the Alabama Code provides for the filing of a statement by a candidate, itemizing all moneys expended in sums over $5, giving the names of the various persons to whom such moneys are paid, the specific nature of each item, by whom the service was performed, and the purpose for which it was expended.
> Section 595 of the code provides that if the statement required to be made prior to such election is not made by any candidate, the name of such candidate shall not be placed upon the ballot to be used in such election.
> In the record on pages 425 and 426 is a copy of Mr. Bankhead's statement of expeditures made by him in the primary election. It totals $6,106.78. This statement was sworn to on the 5th day of August, 1930.
> A careful examination of that statement shows that there are seven items in it, totaling $3,977.09, which do not comply with the sections of the code above referred to.

Now let me continue with the summary by counsel for Mr. Heflin:

> 4. It was as essential for Mr. Bankhead to be lawfully nominated, as it was for him to be a qualified elector, in order to be elected in Alabama. Nomination is one of the conditions precedent to being elected to office in Alabama.
> 5. Not being lawfully nominated, Mr. Bankhead was not elected. His name was unlawfully on the ballot in the general election.

6. Senator Heflin was regularly nominated as the statutes of Alabama require; his name was lawfully on the ballot in the general election held on November 4, 1930, and he received every vote that could be lawfully cast for United States Senator from Alabama in that election.

In connection with the sixth proposition I may say that the committee did not take this view. The minority members concluded that no one was elected in Alabama in 1930.

7. There are 2,043 boxes in 64 counties in Alabama.

8. The boxes in three counties were unlawfully burned as soon as an investigation of the Alabama election was undertaken.

9. The seals on at least 905 boxes were unlawfully broken and the boxes entered prior to their delivery to agents of the committee in Alabama.

10. In 1,918 boxes (practically 94 per cent of the total) the ballots were not numbered as required by law.

11. There are 1,842 official envelopes, papers, etc., requiring the signatures of two or more election officers, where two or more names were signed by one person, in violation of the law.

12. There are 497 boxes in which the ballots were found folded and apparently had never been handled by the election officers.

13. There are 488 additional boxes in which the ballots were in their original folds, the ballots in each box being small tight folds and in many instances uniformly folded. The physical appearance of the ballots in these boxes refute any suggestion that they were ever opened and counted on election night or at any other time before they reached Washington.

14. There are 228 boxes in which the tally sheets were not totaled.

15. There are 569 boxes in which a list of the qualified voters, by which the election was held, which is required by law to be certified and secured in the box, was missing.

16. There are 576 boxes wherein the ballots were found loose in the box, instead of being rolled, sealed, secured, and identified, as required by law.

17. There were 651 boxes in which the stubs were not detached from the ballots, showing that these ballots were surreptitiously "stuffed" into these boxes, and law (Code, sec. 494) requiring stubs to be detached from the ballots before they are placed in the box.

18. There are 1,119 boxes in which there was no sealed certificate of the results as required by law.

19. There are 543 boxes that contain ballots from which the stubs have not been detached, wherein the stubs were not initialed, showing that these ballots never were official ballots, the law requiring the stub of an official ballot to be initialed by one of the election officers. (Sec. 493, Code of Alabama.)

20. There are 429 boxes in which no certificate of results (required by law to be sealed and deposited in the box) could be found in the boxes. Two hundred and thirty-five alleged certificates were procured from outside sources, leaving 194 boxes without any certificate from any source.

21. There are 643 boxes in which no certified poll list—i. e., a list of the electors who voted in that box—could be found. The law requires a certified poll list to be deposited in the box and the box sealed after the ballots have been counted.

22. There are 2,335 incomplete challenged oaths in the boxes.

23. There are 50 boxes wherein more ballots were found than voters shown on poll lists.

24. There are 82 boxes wherein the poll lists showed more voters than ballots found in the boxes.

25. There are 23 boxes wherein the ballots now in those show that the impression made in marking one ballot was carried through and made an impression upon the other ballots. This shows these ballots were marked while the ballots were in a pad. An elector is allowed but one ballot under the law, which is required to be marked secretly.

26. The ballots of watchers on duty to see that the election was fairly conducted, who voted for Heflin, were changed or swapped for ballots marked for Bankhead, without the watcher becoming aware of it, so artistically and so deftly was this fraud and thievery perpetrated.

27. Ballots marked for Heflin and cast for Heflin are in the boxes now marked for Bankhead, or a Bankhead ballot has been swapped for the ballot originally marked and cast for Heflin.

28. Ballots marked and cast for Heflin were not in the boxes when they were collected by the committee and have never been found.

29. Forgery was resorted to in order to cast absentee ballots for Mr. Bankhead. Many witnesses went to the polls, to find on arrival that an absentee ballot had already been cast for them without their knowledge or consent.

30. Approximately 36,000 illegal votes cast have been discovered by the supervisor. How many more illegal ballots were cast we do not know at this time.

31. Ballots were handed voters that had been previously marked for Bankhead; they had been so marked when they were received by election officers.

32. Many witnesses testified that persons desiring to vote for Senator Heflin were challenged without cause and were so annoyed that they left the polling place without voting.

33. In many instances a hat box or other similar box was used instead of a regular ballot box, some of the ballots being put in the box and others being piled around it.

34. Watchers selected by Senator Heflin were threatened and prevented from doing their duty.

35. Persons were permitted to vote without appearing in person. Managers left the polling place with blank ballots and returned with them marked and they were placed in the ballot box as though the voter had appeared in person. Some of these were sick, some were in hospitals, some were at the roadside in automobiles, and one person was 35 miles away. This was a widespread practice.

36. There were two instances where ballots were rejected over protest, one where 21 ballots were rejected, and another where 24 ballots were rejected. All of these were cast for Senator Heflin and counted by the supervisor.

37. One person at least was employed to solicit persons residing in Jefferson County whose names were on the qualified list in Shelby County to cast absolute ballots. The testimony shows that there were 107 such persons solicited by one person and that 63 of them voted.

38. The law of Alabama provides that a person paying the poll tax of another shall be guilty of bribery and shall be imprisoned for not less than one and not more than five years. Testimony shows that it was not only permitted, but it was the practice in Alabama to pay the poll tax of other persons. It is impossible to say how many persons voted whose tax had been illegally paid.

39. Two persons were permitted to vote who admitted to the officers that they lived in another county, but that it was too late in the day for them to get to their regular polling place.

40. Thousands of persons were permitted to vote by absentee ballots who did not live in the county in which they voted.

41. Booths for the accommodation of voters were not furnished in accordance with the Alabama law.

42. In 543 election districts the oaths of the inspectors, clerks, and returning officers were not attested.

43. Six hundred and thirty-four inspectors did not subscribe to oath.

44. Four hundred and fifty-three clerks did not subscribe to oath.

45. Three hundred and forty-nine returning officers did not subscribe to oath.

46. Six hundred and four inspectors did not certify to poll list.

47. In 140 election districts the poll list was not signed by the inspectors, clerks, or returning officer.

48. Thirty-one election districts where the committee was not furnished the poll lists. The committee could not ascertain whether the 186 officers in those districts subscribed the oath or not.

49. The Legislature of Alabama passed an act since the 1930 election, and after this investigation had been begun by the committee, directing the probate judges of Alabama to investigate the Alabama election in 1930 for United States Senator. This was done at the instance of Mr. Bankhead. Under the Alabama law the election is largely controlled by the probate judge of each country. Mr. Bankhead admitted that 60 out of the 67 of these probate judges were partisans of his.

50. The report of the supervisor shows that the election law of Alabama in the 1930 election was not fully complied with in a single precinct.

51. Irregularities of such substantial nature and so numerous vitiate an election without regard to direct proof of actual fraud.

52. Proof of widespread violations of the election law is prima facie evidence of fraud and makes out contestant's case.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Is it the contention of the Senator that irregularities were so universal and of such grave moment that there was no election at all?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is exactly my position.

Mr. BORAH. Is there anything in the record to associate Mr. Bankhead with those irregularities?

Mr. HASTINGS. Speaking generally, nothing more than the fact that 60 of the 67 probate judges were partisans of his.

Mr. BORAH. Was the election in 1930 any different from other elections in Alabama?

Mr. HASTINGS. The contention is made that it was the cleanest election in Alabama for 50 years, or something like that. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. How far is a candidate responsible for the irregularities which took place without his connivance?

Mr. HASTINGS. All the books hold that when a man is a candidate and his partisans have done irregular and fraudulent things, he must of necessity suffer if it goes to the extent of throwing out the election.

Mr. BORAH. If they have done fraudulent things; but must not the candidate in some way be associated with that fraudulent conduct?

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the Senator mean personally?

Mr. BORAH. I mean personally or knowingly through his agents.

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, I do not think so.

Mr. BORAH. A gentleman appeared the other day before a committee of which I was chairman and testified there had not been a clean and incorrupt election, except one, in a certain city in the United States for 30 years. He spoke of irregularities; the manner in which the ballot boxes were controlled and "stuffed," to use the ordinary term; and said there had not been a clean election, an election in which the election law had been observed, in that city for 30 years. It could not be said that a candidate for the United States Senate in one of those elections was responsible for that general breakdown of the election laws, could it?

Mr. HASTINGS. My understanding of the law is this: If, in making inquiry about an election, there can be segregated the serious irregularities—if they are serious enough to warrant throwing out the ballots of a particular polling place or a particular county or what not—and there is left a substantial vote from which it can be reasonably determined that the people have expressed their will, then those tainted ballots may be thrown out, and from those that are left the election may be proceeded with and a determination reached.

Mr. BORAH. Irregular as this election was, there is nothing to indicate, is there, that Mr. Bankhead was not the choice of those who cast their ballots?

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, I do not think there is any way of determining that question at all; we can do nothing more than guess at it. When as to half the ballots that were cast in Alabama and put in boxes, we find that the seal has been broken and the ballots have not been rolled and sealed as the law provides, I ask who is to say whether or not, under those circumstances, there has been fraud or whether there has not been fraud? In other words——

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HASTINGS. If the Senator will permit me—in other words, does not that fact of itself shift the burden immediately and put it upon the candidate to show why those particular boxes were broken, and to show that they were not broken for any improper purpose? That is but one illustration.

Mr. BORAH. It does not seem to me that the burden shifts and that the responsibility rests upon the candidate to show affirmatively that there was a regular election unless he be associated with those irregularities.

Mr. HASTINGS. Perhaps I had better take up that question and let us see what Congress has done about it in the past.

The rule adopted by the House in the case of Butts v. Mackey, second South Carolina district, Forty-fourth Congress, was that the election was by this species of fraud and irregularity invalidated. The House committee unanimously declared this rule, on the showing of the evidence that voters were permitted to vote at other voting precincts than their own in their respective counties; and the committee used this language:

> Every facility is furnished for fraud and, even where the election officers are honest, great frauds may be readily committed without there being any practical means of detecting them. It is indispensable to a fair election that the electors shall be required to vote in the precinct where they reside.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. Will the Senator from Delaware state if the number of votes which he contends were irregular or wrongful equal in their total sum what is claimed to be the majority of the one who claims to be the victor? Does the Senator say that the number of votes which he claims to be irregular and wrongful were equal in number to the majority that is contended in behalf of the victor?

Mr. HASTINGS. I am sorry I do not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. LEWIS. Let me put it in this way: Possibly it is my fault in being a little involved. Is it the opinion of the Senator, or his judgment, that the number of votes which he contends were tainted with some irregularity or wrong equal the majority that is claimed for Mr. Bankhead?

Mr. HASTINGS. I think I now understand the Senator's question. I may say this: It has been impossible to segregate one from the other, for the reason that there is not a single precinct in the State in which there was not some irregularity.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, certainly mere irregularities are not sufficient to invalidate an election. The Senator does not contend that just any kind of irregularities invalidate an election? There is a class of irregularities which do not, as I understand, invalidate an election.

Mr. HASTINGS. Not at all.

Mr. BORAH. The point is, What were the irregularities which the Senator thinks invalidated the election? Was it the mere fact that the ballots were not certified and held in the ballot boxes until they were counted?

Mr. HASTINGS. It is a combination of many violations that impresses me in this matter.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the Senator, the election was so irregular that he feels that there was no real expression of the people's voice?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. Then, secondly, the Senator says that this is claimed to have been the most regular election which has been held in Alabama for 30 years. That being true, and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Bankhead] having pursued the ordinary course pursued in Alabama, taking the same method of securing his election that his predecessors had followed, can it be said that he in any way becomes personally associated with these irregularities? He simply adopted the method which had been practiced for 30 years. What I would like to know were these irregularities of exceptional nature.

Mr. HASTINGS. Of course, if Mr. Bankhead is not held responsible, then there is nothing in this case outside the question of the primary.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Delaware is infinitely better informed about this case than I am, and I am seeking information; but I can not believe, where there is a general election and where there are irregularities running through the general election which apply to all candidates, those for Senator and all other offices, that a Senator can be selected out unless associated personally with those irregularities in such a way as to make him culpable and thereby responsible for what happened.

There was a governor elected; there were Congressmen elected; there were precinct officers elected; there were candidates elected all up and down the line; they are in office; they are holding office; their election has not been challenged. It is the method which Alabama has pursued for 30 years. Now, can we select out the Senator from that group of candidates and associate him individually with the irregularities in such a way as to make him responsible?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, the Senate, as it seems to me, has done it many times, if I understand the cases. If I may go off my line of argument for a moment, I will refer to them. The Senator from Idaho is familiar with the Vare-Wilson case. In that case—and I am now talking about the election and the election alone—there never was a word of protest; there never was any evidence of any kind showing that Vare was responsible for anything that happened in that election.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I can not quite agree with the Senator in that. There was such an enormous amount of money used for Vare that the presumption was that it corrupted the election.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator is now talking about the primary; I am just now talking about the election itself.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for an observation in that connection?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In answer to the Senator from Idaho I merely desire to make this statement: There is no question in the world but that Mr. Smith was elected along with the other Republican candidates who were elected in the State of Illinois, but we singled him out and he was denied permission even to cross the threshold of the Senate. So in the case of Vare because of the election—not the primary but the election—we never let Mr. Vare get across the threshold, except to take a seat for a moment; and yet all the other candidates on the Republican ticket in Pennsylvania were elected in that same election. The Senator from Idaho voted to exclude both Mr. Vare, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Smith, of Illinois. Both were singled out.

Those were cases where the only question raised was the amount of money expended in the election. I voted to exclude them both, because I thought the amount of money used in the campaign was exorbitant, extravagant, and entirely too great; but, Mr. President, in the primary in Alabama there was not a single election district in the State that operated according to the law of Alabama. So I do not get the distinction the Senator from Idaho makes when he says we should not single out the Senator from Alabama, who has been, at any rate, the beneficiary of all this rottenness and corruption and irregularity, because—and it is a rather queer line of reasoning it seems to me—the other candidates were not questioned but were permitted to come in and take their offices, and because such method has been pursued in Alabama for 30 years. If it has been pursued for a thousand years, if it is corrupt, it is wrong and, in my judgment, ought to be challenged by the Senate.

So, it seems to me that all precedents of the Senate in the past have been right along the line of singling out a Senator. We are not particularly interested, as a body, in the sheriffs who were elected in Alabama; we are not interested except as the election relates to a senatorial office. We are not interested in the election of the secretary of state in Alabama, or the treasurer of the State; we are not interested in the election of Members of the House.

If anything has gone wrong in such an election, if there has been corruption and a Congressman has been elected as a result of corruption, it is the duty of the body at the other end of the Capitol to purge itself of any irregularity. The Senate is interested in its own membership, and we have excluded within the last three or four years two Members, who happened to be on the Republican side of the Chamber, namely, Vare in Pennsylvania and Smith in Illinois, not as a result of primaries alone but of elections as well. After they had been fairly elected, there being no question about their election, they were singled out. That is the point I make, if it please the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana is speaking of something I did not know was in this record, and that is corruption.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If the Senator will read the report of the Senator from Delaware, the chairman of the subcommittee, as carefully as I myself have tried to read it, he is bound to be convinced that corruption is practically admitted by everybody, not only in one place but all over the State.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I may be mistaken. I have read the record, but, perhaps, I do not understand it. I understood that the invalidity of the election rested upon what the Senator contends was the universal irregularity with which it was carried on. There is no evidence in the record that I have seen that Mr. Bankhead, like Mr. Vare, used money for the purpose of creating those irregularities. If there is such evidence, that settles the matter with me.

The Senator from Indiana is talking about something that I do not believe is in the record. That corruption tainting an election in part taints it in whole I admit, but I myself have not found any corruption in this record. I have found irregularities; but I remember when Lamar came here from Mississippi and it was claimed that he had not been elected, that he had been elected at a town meeting, that there was no State government in Mississippi, that it was a mob affair, the Senate, nevertheless, admitted him and gave him his seat because he accepted the method which they were using at that time to elect Senators in Mississippi.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield further to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If the Senator will again read the record, and read it carefully, I think he will find all sorts of evidence of corruption of which the Senator elect was the direct beneficiary. I assume the Senator from Delaware will point that out carefully as he proceeds, and I hope it may change the mind of the Senator from Idaho on that subject.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, if they have proven corruption to such an extent that it invalidates the election——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is exactly the point.

Mr. BORAH. Or if they have proven it in part only and still the Senator elected was associated with it, of course, I would not vote to seat him.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Exactly; and I do not see how anyone can read the record without agreeing with the Senator from Delaware, the chairman of the subcommittee, in his conclusion that there was no election held in Alabama for Senator in 1930. This is in line with what the Senate has decided in the past in cases exactly like this, in which the Senator from Idaho—for whom I have the highest admiration—and myself cast similar votes.

Mr. BORAH. I do not know just how the Senator from Indiana voted. I voted to admit both Smith and Vare to this floor to defend themselves. I voted against seating both of them because I believed that they were guilty of affirmatively using money in a corrupt way.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then the Senator from Idaho did not go as far as I did. I voted to prevent them from even having the oath administered, because I felt that there was corruption in both the States, and that they ought to be denied admission; but substantially it amounted to the same thing in the end. Both of us voted to exclude them.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, in the first place I think it might be well to observe that there may be corruption in an election without the use of money. I think people generally and frequently emphasize unduly corruption by the use of money. So far as I am concerned, I can not see much difference between the system of going out and corrupting the electorate in order to get the position of United States Senator and having the people themselves do corrupt things because they want to see their own man succeed.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator says "having people to corrupt things." If Senator Bankhead had people do corrupt things, of course, he is just as responsible as if he had done the corrupt things himself.

Mr. HASTINGS. But does the Senator from Idaho think for a moment that a man who sits in the Senate is not to be held responsible for the corrupt things that are done in his favor, even without his knowing it? I am now talking about substance. I am not talking about a few little things that might affect the election, but I am talking about substantial things that make it doubtful whether the corrupt things done by his lieutenants or his partisans may have influenced the election to such an extent as to make us unable to determine what the choice of the people of that State was.

Mr. BORAH. Undoubtedly if the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. Bankhead] knew that corruption was being practiced, even upon a small scale, he would be responsible for it; and undoubtedly, too, there may be corruption in other forms than money. But what does the Senator mean when he says that he "had people do corrupt things"?

Mr. HASTINGS. I certainly did not mean to say that Senator Bankhead had such things done; and for fear I may be misunderstood in this argument I want to state distinctly that so far as I have been able to observe this record, the most offensive thing that he did related to the primary, when he permitted and did not protest against the action of the executive committee in the resolution it adopted. So far as the election is concerned and so far as his part in it is concerned, I want to say distinctly, and to be definitely understood as saying, that there is not a thing in the record that can be traced definitely and positively to Mr. Bankhead.

Mr. BORAH. That is the way I understood the record. I do not find any corrupt or wrongful acts upon the part of Mr. Bankhead.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is correct; and I want to be certain that that is understood.

In order that I may ascertain whether or not I am traveling in the right road in determining what the practice of the Senate is with respect to this matter, I desire to advert for a moment to the Vare case; and I want to be certain, when I do it, to dissociate the election of Vare, the Wilson-Vare contest, from the primary, because in no other way can I make my point clear.

I have read carefully the speeches made in the Senate upon this subject. I read the speeches on the subject made by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON], who was on that committee with the then junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. Caraway], and two or three specific things were pointed out. One of them was that in the city of Pittsburgh from 11 to 12 per cent of the people had been employed at the rate of $5 a day, three of them at each polling place being called watchers, and then there being some provision for messengers. A sum of money of approximately forty-nine to fifty thousand dollars was expended for those purposes in the city of Pittsburgh. There was no evidence in that connection with respect to Vare. Nothing was shown in the record to indicate that Vare had anything to do with that.

In addition to that, in the city of Pittsburgh there were three or four boxes in which it was definitely shown that fraud had been committed by the election officers. Not only was that shown but they had been prosecuted by the officials of the State of Pennsylvania for that fraud.

That was one charge with respect to that contest. The other was in the city of Philadelphia, where something like one-third of the precincts were involved in the charge made by Wilson. In order to find out what happened the committee took testimony and examined the ballots. Here is what they found, and this is all they found: They found in some of those ballot boxes a change of some 20 votes in favor of Vare. Vare gained some votes in that contest, but that was not the worst they found. They found a list or slip kept at the prothonotary's office which gave, or was supposed to give, the time when these particular boxes got in there. An examination was made, and a test was made to find out whether it was possible to count those ballots after the polls closed and get them there in time. It was found that it was impossible to do it. There was no evidence to show who kept that record. There was no evidence to show that the record was proper as to the time. There were some things to show that it was not proper.

The committee reached the conclusion, with respect to that matter, that those ballots had not been counted, and therefore it was necessary to throw them out of the count entirely. It concluded that the officers did not count them; they could not possibly have counted them, and therefore they could not be counted in the majority that Vare got. The committee reached that definite conclusion—that is, that part of the committee for which the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] spoke on the floor of the Senate.

The Senator from New Mexico also referred to the fact that in the case of some of the boxes Vare got 100 per cent of the votes and Wilson did not get any votes. Vare got them all. He referred again to the fact that there was a 100 per cent vote cast in the district. From all that the Senator from New Mexico drew the conclusion that there was fraud in those places, and that it affected that district, and those votes had to be thrown out. He reached the conclusion that the money paid in Pittsburgh, although under the law it was legal, was shocking; and they threw out the votes in Pittsburgh.

From the speech of the Senator from New Mexico, it appears that he threw out everything except in those instances where the charge was made that the jurat was not signed when the officers took the oath. He not only threw out all these votes, because he drew from those facts fraud which from his point of view made it necessary to throw them out, but what else did the committee do? They reached the conclusion from that alone, notwithstanding the fact that all the balance of the votes was left, and that this was only a small portion of the votes in Pennsylvania, notwithstanding the fact that Vare had 19,000 votes left, that the election was so tainted with fraud that they were opposed to his being seated in this body at all.

I say, taking that as a precedent—and that precedent was followed by a great majority in this body—this Alabama case is not only tainted with fraud but it is smeared all over with fraud, and nobody can tell what was intended by the citizens of Alabama with respect to it.

It is upon that theory that I have made this investigation. It is upon that theory that I have urged this report upon my colleagues. It is upon that theory that I now present it to the Senate; and it is wholly immaterial to me what the Senate may do with it.

I propose to do my job as best I can, and in doing it I propose to present all the facts to the Senate and to the country, too, with this hope, if you please—not that it makes any difference to us on this side or to those on the other side what particular Democrat may sit there. We all know that Alabama is a Democratic State. We all know that if Senator Bankhead should be thrown out of this body he will come back again himself, so far as I know, and I should be delighted to have him come back; but I say the time has come when the Senate must determine whether or not they are going to permit people in these States of ours to enact laws and to set up these laws as things that must be lived up to, and then go and violate every one of them, pay no attention at all to them, and send somebody here to the United States Senate and say, "Because we have been doing this year in and year out, the Senate has no business to make any inquiry at all about it."

I want to read what the Senate has done in the past with respect to this matter.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that point, let me ask him what became of the contest between Wilson and Vare?

Mr. HASTINGS. Vare was thrown out.

Mr. BORAH. I know; but he was not thrown out on the contest.

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, yes; undoubtedly. There was a vote on it, and it was upon the election—not upon the primary. I have the record here and I will read the record. It was upon that vote and upon the other vote too. He was thrown out both ways, backward and forward—on the primary and on the election too.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? I am sure the Senator wants to be accurate about the matter.

Mr. HASTINGS. I shall thank the Senator to correct me if I have made a mistake.

Mr. BRATTON. The vote in the Senate was taken on the resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to exclude Vare on account of the primary conduct. The Senate never voted on the contest between Wilson and Vare. The moment Mr. Vare was excluded by the vote cast upon the resolution sponsored by the Senator from Nebraska, the whole matter was ended.

Mr. HASTINGS. I thank the Senator. I am quite certain that he is correct, and I am wrong.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. HASTINGS. Let me say just at that point that I was particularly interested in reading the record because I was trying to find out the difference between the opinion of the Senator from New Mexico in this case and that in the Vare case.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was satisfied that Vare went out on the ground that he was guilty of corruption in carrying on the primary.

Mr. HASTINGS. May I ask the Senator from Idaho, however, to let me read the supplemental report of the committee?

We, the undersigned, members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the contest instituted by the Hon. William B. Wilson against the Hon. William S. Vare, involving the office of United States Senator from the State of Pennsylvania, submit the following supplemental report:

Without approving all of the statements of fact contained in the report of the majority, we concur in the conclusion of the majority in so far as it determines that the contestant, Wilson, has failed to show affirmatively that he received a plurality of the legally qualified votes cast for Senator in the election of November 2, 1926, in the State of Pennsylvania, and therefore is not entitled to the seat in question.

We dissent from the conclusion of the majority that the contestee, Vare, received a plurality of the legal votes cast in said election, and in legal consequence, therefore, is entitled to said seat; because it appears from the evidence taken by the special committee of the Senate and made available for use and consideration by this committee under the provisions of Senate Resolution 68, together with the evidence submitted to this committee in the hearing of said cause, that on account of the excessive expenditure of money in the primary held in said State preceding the election in question, the expenditure of money in the election itself, and fraud committed by the contestee or by others in his behalf, the contestee's title to said office is tainted with fraud.

We conclude, therefore, that the contestee is not entitled to a seat in the Senate as Senator from the State of Pennsylvania.

Now I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before I sit down, I want to say this, that I do not want the Senator from Delaware to think that I am finding fault with his presentation, or finding fault with the remarkable amount of work which he has done upon this case. I am simply trying to get the facts from the Senator, and I know the Senator from Delaware is in possession of them. I have great respect for his judgment and I know he will do his duty as he sees it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I did not mean to appear to be annoyed; I was not annoyed at the interruption or the suggestion of the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. What the Senator has just read from the record of the Vare case coincides with my own recollection of what took place at that time. The election was involved, as well as the primary. So Vare was not thrown out on account of the primary alone, but on account of the primary and election, as the Senator just now read from the statement of the committee itself.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. The Senator from Delaware is reading from the report made in the contest. The Senate never did vote upon the contest one way or the other. The vote came upon a resolution offered by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] relating exclusively to the primary, and upon that resolution Mr. Vare was excluded from the Senate. The committee proceeding naturally died at that moment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Of course, after he was excluded, there was no use excluding him again.

Mr. BRATTON. Of course.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But this report shows conclusively that the committee held at the time—and of course the Senate followed the committee, certainly in the primary report, in any event—that the election itself was tainted with fraud. There is no doubt the vote would have been precisely the same on either question. Besides, in the end the effect of the action was to hold that there was no election. Mr. Wilson was here contesting for the seat claimed by Mr. Vare, just exactly as Mr. Heflin is contesting now against Mr. Bankhead. In the end, of course, neither one was seated. It was held practically that there was no election. That was the result, and that is exactly what the Senate subcommittee recommends in this instance.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, the point I make is that no vote was ever taken in the contest proceeding; it never came to a vote in the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, no vote was ever taken on the question of whether or not there was fraud in the election.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Unless my recollection fails, both the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from New Mexico are partly right and partly wrong. I am speaking from memory; I have not looked it up since the matter was before the Senate; but Mr. Vare, according to my recollection, was prevented from taking the oath of office by a resolution which referred exclusively and only to the primary election. But Mr. Wilson, who was the Democratic candidate at that election, of course was not precluded from following up the contest which he had commenced, claiming that he was elected. Wilson's contest went before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and there were two reports. We did have a vote as to whether Wilson was elected. Vare had already gone; he was thrown out, but of course the contest of Wilson necessarily took within its scope all the votes that were cast for Vare, and that is why it is referred to.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is as I recollect it.

Mr. BORAH. Did we have a vote on the question as to whether Wilson was entitled to the seat?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but that was after Mr. Vare had been excluded. Every Senator will realize that it was perfectly proper and legal for Mr. Wilson to claim, as he did, that he was elected in the election. That was entirely independent of the report of the special committee upon which was founded the resolution under which Vare was thrown out. Wilson went on with his contest, claiming that at the election he was elected to the Senate. That matter finally reached a climax here in the Senate, and we passed on the contest, voted on it, and it was decided by the Senate that Mr. Wilson was not elected.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. The Senator from Nebraska is correct, and I was incorrect in part. Vare was excluded on the resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska, and that eliminated him. After he was excluded, as I recall, we took a vote on the question as to whether Wilson was entitled to the seat, and the Senate held that, having failed to receive a majority of the legal votes, he was not entitled to the seat. That vote related to Wilson's right to the seat, and not to Vare's right to the seat. Vare was disposed of by the vote on the resolution offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I would like to suggest to the Senator from Delaware that the Senate excluded Smith of Illinois, after he had been appointed by the governor, without any question of primary election or the November election being involved at all.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I was unable to be here when the Senator began his address, but I have read a large part of his report, and I should like to get from the Senator the basis of his contention that the Senator from Alabama should not continue in his seat. Is it on the basis of the action of the Democratic committee in Alabama with regard to the primary, or is it on the basis of failure to observe the law in the election; or is it on both grounds?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I think that under the precedents, here, particularly with some Senators who firmly believe in the precedent with respect to the primary, Mr. Bankhead must of necessity be excluded upon the question of the primary, because the primary was illegal. I have not undertaken to divide the two, or to poll the committee with respect to the two, but I have undertaken and am now undertaking to put all of the facts before the Senate.

In the first part of my address I called attention to the primary. I am sorry there were not more Senators present at the time. I challenged the statement made by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] yesterday in two particulars.

I challenged the Senator's argument that the people in Alabama had since 1910 been accustomed to making the requirement made in the 1930 election. I called attention to the fact that there were only two instances, one in 1922, when they modified it somewhat, and again in 1926, when they did not modify it, so that as I see it the only time when they put any such restriction in was in 1926. They did not put in any in 1920 at all. In 1924 it was referred to the executive committee, in 1928 it was left out entirely, and the first time it appeared in any such form as it appears here in question, was in 1930.

I think the Senator from New Mexico might very well have gotten mixed when he said there was nothing in the record, because as I looked at the record at the time he was talking I agreed with him. But the reference to 1928 was placed ahead of the reference to 1922, and it was rather difficult in the record to turn to the particular pages. But I am very anxious that those interested in the subject should read the Lett case, which, it is contended by the Senator from New Mexico, is controlling. In my judgment it is not only not controlling, it is not even persuasive, because it does not touch this point at all. I think I can explain in a minute the difference between the two.

In the Republican primary, the one which gave rise to the Lett case, the Republican Party provided that before a man became a candidate he should take an oath stating how he voted in the last general election, or something to that effect. That is the one thing. It did not exclude him, it did not pretend to exclude him, but it did make available, and specifically made available to the public and to the persons who were interested in the subject, the affidavit made by the candidate, so that the people might find out, if you please, what kind of a Republican he was, and whether he was the kind of a Republican they wanted nominated or whether he was not. That is what the court said might be done under that statute.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. In that case Lett declined to take the oath and the committee refused to put his name on the ticket, and suit was in mandamus to compel them to put his name on the ticket, he asserting that they had excluded him. The court upheld the exclusion and denied the writ. The Senator now says that they did not exclude him, that they merely provided evidence of what kind of a Republican he was. They did exclude him, and the suit was to compel them to include him, and the court upheld the exclusion.

Mr. HASTINGS. Very well.

Mr. BRATTON. So that the case is on all fours with the one here, so far as the power to require the affidavit of the candidate is concerned.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is just the difference between the two. What the Senator says is exactly correct; but what I say is this: That in the 1930 primary resolution adopted by the Democratic executive committee in Alabama they prescribed that which Heflin, for instance, could not comply with. The Republicans did not prescribe anything which Lett could not comply with. He could make his affidavit and expose his politics, and the only argument made with respect to it was that he ought not, under the secrecy of the ballot in Alabama, be compelled to expose his politics, and that was the defense to that case.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I can see the distinction the Senator is drawing, and I want to be sure I am right. The Senator from New Mexico has stated correctly, as I understand the Lett case, just what happened, but the Senator from Delaware is contending, as I understand him, that in the Lett case, if Lett had complied with the order of the committee and made the affidavit, he would still have been, by that committee, permitted to run in the primary.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is my contention, and if I am wrong in that, if there is anything in the case itself which warrants any other conclusion than that, I would like to have it pointed out to me.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator's theory is that the object the Republican committee had in view in the Lett case was to compel all candidates to let the people who had a right to vote in the primary know really what they had been doing, how loyal party men they were, and then let the people at the primary consider that information, if they wanted to, in passing on the candidates.

Mr. HASTINGS. If I may be permitted to put the Heflin-Bankhead resolution on the same basis as the other, it would have provided something to this effect: "All the candidates on the Democratic ticket shall be compelled to file an affidavit with the Democratic executive committee stating whether or not they supported Governor Smith in 1928, whether they openly worked against him," and so forth, and so on, and stop there. If they did that under the Lett case, they would have been within the law. But they did not do that. They simply provided that the man who did those things might not be put upon the primary ticket.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Am I to understand the Senator to say the resolution adopted by the committee relative to the primary in the campaign of 1930 had one precedent, and that is the resolution of 1926?

Mr. HASTINGS. I would like to state just how nearly it was a precedent. I think it might be called, roughly, a precedent, although I will read the difference. In order that Senators may find out just what was going through the minds of the committee, I want to refer to the 1922 resolution in which there is this provision:

> 3. That all candidates for any of the offices or party places be nominated in said primary shall qualify as such candidate on or before the 1st day of May, 1922, by filing, if a candidate for a State office or a State party office, his or her name with the chairman of this committee, and if a candidate for a county office or county party office, his or her name with the chairman of his or her county Democratic executive committee, designating the office or the place for which he or she is a candidate, and under oath declaring that he or she did not in the presidential election of 1920, support the presidential electors of any party other than the Democratic Party.

Mr. BORAH. Does that exclude them if they did support someone else?

Mr. HASTINGS. I think it does. But I invite the Senator's attention to a further resolution. That one was dated January 13, 1922, and the other dated April 28, 1922:

> That no person shall become a candidate for any State, district, Federal, or circuit office, or have his or her name printed upon the Democratic ballot in the primary election to be held on the 12th day of August, 1930, if such person either voted a Republican presidential ticket in November, 1928, or openly and publicly opposed the election of the nominees of the Democratic Party, or either of them, or who opposed the election of the Democratic electors for President or Vice President in November, 1928.

In substance, that is, declaring that he is a Democrat. I think that might very well be considered explanation of what is meant over here when they state that he shall take an oath—

> And under oath declare that he did not in the presidential election of 1920 support the presidential elector of any party other than that of the Democratic Party.

That was in 1922. In 1920 they did not have any such provision at all. In 1922 they put in this language. In 1924 it was referred to the executive committee, and there is no record of what they did. In 1926 they put in the same provision they had in 1922. In 1928 they put in nothing, and in 1930 they put in this provision:

That no person shall become a candidate for any State, district, Federal, or circuit office, or have his or her name printed upon the Democratic ballot in the primary election to be held on the 12th day of August, 1930, if such person either voted a Republican presidential ticket in November, 1928, or openly and publicly opposed the election of the nominees of the Democratic Party, or either of them, or who opposed the election of the Democratic electors for President or Vice President in November, 1928.

I do not know whether to call that a precedent or not. It is not exactly the same. It goes further than any other declaration.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. It is admitted, is it not, that they could fix those qualifications for a candidate? They had that power under the statute, had they not?

Mr. HASTINGS. They can fix any qualifications for the candidate so long as they fix the same for the electors.

Mr. BORAH. That is a subject of debate; but it is admitted that they can fix any qualifications they see fit for a candidate?

Mr. HASTINGS. I suppose we would have to say "reasonable."

Mr. BORAH. I do not know whether we would have to use the word "reasonable" in politics or not. [Laughter.] It seems to be admitted that they could fix any qualifications they saw fit, we will say reasonable qualifications; but the contention of the Senator is that if they fixed any qualification, the same qualification must apply to the voter?

Mr. HASTINGS. Undoubtedly.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, may I inquire if this question went to the Supreme Court of Alabama?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not think either of the questions did. I think the supreme court is not the highest court of Alabama.

Mr. DILL. I mean to the court of last resort.

Mr. HASTINGS. What happened was this: Upon this resolution being adopted, somebody took the case into the court of equity. It was not Heflin, but somebody took it into the court of equity.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. It was taken into court by Judge Wilkinson, attorney for Senator Heflin, who has been arguing before the committee.

Mr. HASTINGS. It was not in the name of Heflin.

Mr. BLACK. It was in the name of Wilkinson.

Mr. HASTINGS. But it was not in the name of Heflin. I will state in order to be fair that the contention on the other side is that because Heflin did not do that himself he is now shut off from complaining, so I wanted to make it clear that Heflin did not take the action himself and therefore is not in that position, but it was taken by Wilkinson. It does not make any difference who took it outside of the fact that it was not taken by Heflin. The court of equity heard the argument and ruled that it did not have jurisdiction, one judge dissenting and holding in his dissent with Senator BLACK, who made a statement about it when the ruling was first made, that this was unlawful, illegal, and beyond the authority of any executive committee to do.

Mr. DILL. Was the matter carried to any higher court?

Mr. HASTINGS. No; it was not.

Mr. DILL. There was no appeal taken?

Mr. HASTINGS. No.

Mr. BLACK. That was the highest court in the State.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the Senator from Alabama state just what court it was?

Mr. BLACK. The supreme court.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is that the supreme court of the State?

Mr. BLACK. That is the court of last resort.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. In the interest of accuracy and in connection with the argument I made yesterday that it was incumbent upon Senator Heflin to take advantage of irregularities in the primary that he complained of, and to do so before the general election, the Senator will recall that the case instituted by Judge Wilkinson was only to enjoin the spending of public money to hold the primary. It was instituted before the primary was held. The Senator will agree with me in that statement?

Mr. HASTINGS. I am satisfied the Senator's statement is correct. I do not recollect the facts.

Mr. BRATTON. In that case the court held that the court of equity had no jurisdiction to grant an injunction for that purpose; but after the primary was conducted and Mr. Bankhead was declared to be the nominee, neither Mr. Heflin nor anyone else took any steps to prevent Mr. Bankhead's name going on the ticket at the November election as the nominee of the Democratic Party. The Senator and I will agree upon that as a correct statement of the facts.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is undoubtedly correct.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HEBERT in the chair). Does the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Neither of the Senators seems to regard this case in the supreme court as of any importance, but to my mind it has a very important bearing on the controversy. As I understand it, an action was commenced asking for an injunction restraining any of the officials in Alabama from expending any public money in the primaries—and that was done before the primaries were held—basing it on the ground that this action of the Democratic Party was illegal and contrary to law and that under that order of the Democratic Party no lawful primary could be held. When that was decided by the Supreme Court of Alabama, it was decided by a divided court, the majority holding that the lower court had no jurisdiction, the minority of one judge holding that they did have jurisdiction, and in the minority opinion he went into the facts and the law and held that the action of the Democratic committee was illegal and that no legal primary should be held under it.

Did the majority opinion take up the facts as they were admitted to be or did it go off on a technicality?

Mr. HASTINGS. Purely upon the jurisdictional question, as I understand it. There was no expression from anybody except the dissenting judge.

Mr. NORRIS. And he said in his opinion as I understand it that the action of the Democratic committee made the primary illegal?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is correct. I will read it:

The statute is plain and unambiguous; it is its own interpreter, and expresses the legislative intent. The intent and expressed purpose of the legislature are found in the use of the words "for its candidates" after the words "political party."

I have stated heretofore that those words "for its candidates" were put in the statute in 1919 because it was the only way in which they could make the public pay for the primary expense, following the decision in Texas, and they modified their statute in 1919 and put in those words "for its candidates" in section 612. The minority opinion continues as follows:

This was the requirement for the one standard of party loyalty and affiliation for all who participated in the primary as electors and as candidates. In this requirement the due right to vote and participate in such primary election of a political party is not denied on grounds made the subject of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Federal Constitution.

(1) The statute, as required to be applied in section 612, code, to electors and candidates alike, was applied by the resolution to the election of candidates for Federal, State, district, circuit offices and State executive committees, and officers to be elected by the vote of a single county for a uniform and single test of party affiliation and loyalty for all electors; (2) a different test of party affiliation and loyalty is prescribed and required of candidates who stand for election to office for Federal, State, circuit, district, or committeemen; different from that prescribed for all electors in party primary; (3) and different test from that permitted (with limitations) of exaction by county executive committee or candidates for county office to be filled by the "votes of a single county."

It follows from this material departure in the resolution from the requirements of law that the primary election called is not the kind of primary that may be held under the law, and at public expense in the State of Alabama.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I notice the judge referred to the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments. As I recall it, the first part of the committee's resolution is that this applies only to white electors.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is right.

Mr. DILL. Was the question ever raised as to that part of the regulation being illegal?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not remember that it was, but the argument was made before the committee that they could not provide qualifications for the electors but had to apply the general law to them. However, the committee did not agree with that contention. We held that in order to keep their party together and decide who should have the right to vote they might exact of the voter who wanted to participate in the Democratic primary such loyalty as they believed they were entitled to have; but in doing so they must put him in the same position as the candidate and they must put the candidate in the same position as that of the voter himself, for in no other way, perhaps, could they keep the party together.

Mr. DILL. Is it the Senator's contention that because a different requirement was prescribed for electors than for candidates, and electors who measured up to that different requirement entered the primary, the primary was illegal? Is it the Senator's contention that because electors who were not required to have the same qualifications as candidates participated in the primary that rendered it illegal?

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, no; if I understand the question, because they might have permitted Republicans or anybody else to vote at those primaries without affecting the validity of the primary itself.

Mr. DILL. It was the ruling, then, that made it invalid?

Mr. HASTINGS. It was the ruling which prevented certain persons from running. If I understand their position, they might just as well have said, "No person who has occupied the position of United States Senator from this State and who has failed to support a certain Democratic measure shall be permitted to become a candidate for the United States Senate from Alabama." As a matter of fact, they have since that time—in February, 1931—done just that; they have provided in specific language that electors do not have to have the same qualifications as candidates, and they themselves may prescribe the qualifications. I say if that be constitutional, then the Democratic State committee of Alabama may exclude any person whom they care to exclude by rules and regulations they may make with respect to who may be candidates.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. I am not familiar with the rule in all the States, and I am not really familiar with the party practice in Delaware. May I ask the Senator what is the power of the political committees in Delaware with reference to fixing the qualifications of candidates?

Mr. HASTINGS. What candidates does the Senator mean—candidate for what office?

Mr. BLACK. Candidates for any office.

Mr. HASTINGS. There is no rule.

Mr. BLACK. Suppose a man wants to become a candidate on the Republican ticket for Senator, what steps does he take in order to do so?

Mr. HASTINGS. Our practice is this: We have a convention. The Republicans elect their delegates to the convention. A Republican convention may nominate a Democrat if it wants to; and a Democratic convention, constituted in the same way, may nominate a Republican. There is no restriction at all; it all depends upon what the voters want. Never before have I known of a place where a man could not occasionally get off the reservation and still have some chance at some time to get back on again.

Mr. BLACK. I desire to ask the Senator another question. Suppose the members of the convention of the Republican Party decide that they did not want to inflict upon the party a man who had failed to vote for the last ticket of their party, would they have the authority to do that?

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the Senator mean to exclude such a man from becoming a candidate?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; not to nominate him.

Mr. HASTINGS. It is wholly up to the convention. They may pick whom they please, but they make no rules about what a candidate's political affiliations are. They do not make him stand up and swear as to everything that he has done in the past and what he hopes to do in the future. They do not do any such thing as that.

Mr. BLACK. Assuming that he was not ashamed to admit what he had done in the past, that has nothing to do with it. The question that I ask is this: Would not the Republican convention in the Senator's State have the right, if it saw fit, to decline to nominate a man because in the previous election he had failed to vote the Republican ticket?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; just as a lot of Republicans failed to vote for me when I thought they ought to have voted for me. [Laughter.] It is just exactly the same kind of a proposition; there is no difference between them.

Mr. BLACK. If I may ask the Senator another question, if the Senate has the right in this case to go into the Alabama primary, would it not also have the right to supervise a Republican convention in Delaware?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not know; the Senator had better ask the Senators if he wishes to find out; I can not answer that question.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask the Senator this question: If it is right and legal for the Senate to attempt to supervise the Alabama primaries, which is the method by which candidates are nominated there, by the same token would it not be right and proper for the Senate to attempt to supervise the convention in any State where that is the method employed for nominating Senators?

Mr. HASTINGS. I have no doubt, under the precedents established by the Senate as to inquiring into primaries, that it may inquire into a convention that nominates a Senator just as certainly as it may into a primary itself, if that is the question the Senator asks.

Mr. BLACK. Then, as I understand the Senator, he believes in and favors the idea of the Senate supervising conventions all over the country held for the nomination of United States Senators.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have not even stated that I am in favor of the Senate supervising the primaries. I am only stating to the Senate what the facts show, as I understand them, and let every Senator decide for himself whether or not he thinks the Senate ought to follow such a procedure.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask the Senator this further question? I want to be sure about the Senator's opinion, because I did not quite get it straight. Do I understand that the Senator is now stating to the Senate that it is his belief that the Senate now should hold that the Alabama primary was illegal by reason of the matters he has set forth?

Mr. HASTINGS. I have expressed no view with respect to that except that it was illegal; and, with that conviction, I am presenting the question to the Senate to decide for itself. I have not had in my mind to decide that question, because I am satisfied of the fact that the circumstances of the election, excluding the primary, make it incumbent upon the Senate to declare that there was no election had on that day; and I insist that it was the duty of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to lay the facts with respect to the primary before the Senate, because the committee knew, as I know, that there are many Members of the Senate who believe very strongly in the importance of the Senate supervising, to some extent, the primaries in which candidates for Senator are chosen.

Mr. BLACK. Then the conclusion which the Senator reaches, as I understand, is not on the basis of what he has said as to the illegality of the primary, but is on the basis of the other features of the case, so far as the Senator individually is concerned?

Mr. HASTINGS. I think that I have made myself clear. I have said that I have not at any time in this case undertaken to reach a definite conclusion that the primaries alone warrant the Senate in declaring that there was no election. I have said that it was not necessary for me to reach that conclusion, because, from my point of view, the other facts are important enough, and the other facts make it necessary for the Senate, in line with its decisions in the past, to decide that there was no election on that day. Now, have I not answered the Senator's question?

Mr. BLACK. May I ask the Senator this additional question, in order that I may be clear as to his position? The Senator, of course, is aware of the fact that, under the Constitution, this body can determine and legislate as to primaries and conventions held in the various States, and that this body has not done that? Does the Senator now believe that it is proper for the Senate, after a State has determined how it shall hold its primaries, to determine the legality of the primary rather than to have the courts of the particular State determine the legality of the primary?

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not think at all that the Senate is bound in any way by the failure of anybody to take this question to the court of his own State. Particularly is that true when there has been an effort on behalf of somebody to test, before the highest court of that State, the validity of the resolution which was adopted by the Democratic State committee in Alabama. That is shown by the decision from which I have read.

Mr. BLACK. Then, as I understand the Senator, he believes that, even without putting into operation the machinery provided in the Constitution for regulating primaries and conventions, the Senate has the right, and it is its duty to act in a supervisory capacity to determine for itself whether a Senator has been duly and legally nominated or whether he has not been?

Mr. HASTINGS. Why does the Senator persist in asking a question which I have declined to answer several times?

Mr. BLACK. If the Senator declines to answer the question, that is all right.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield for that purpose, I should like to make a brief observation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senate went into that question in the Smith case, and the Senate concluded it had the right. It went into the same question in the Vare case and concluded it had the right. Furthermore, the Constitution of the United States itself provides very explicitly that the Senate shall be the judge of the election of its own Members; and some of us believe that the question of elections goes to the primaries as well as to the final fall elections. There is no question but that the Senate has ruled on that point, and has itself answered the Senator's question. That is the point I make. Regardless of what the Senator from Delaware may think, the Senate itself has ruled on that question.

Mr. BLACK. That is where the Senator and I do not agree. In so far as my vote was concerned, it was not based on that ground. My vote was determined by the evidence of corruption on the part of the individual who knocked at the door of the Senate. I voted against Smith because the evidence showed that the public utilities had contributed to further his campaign while he was on a body passing upon the rates of those public utilities. There is no evidence of any such character in this case; the Senator can not find it; and no one has charged it until the Senator from Indiana a few moments ago rose to do so. It was natural, of course, that he should.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I voted to exclude Smith and to prevent him from having the oath administered; there is no question about that. The point I make is that the Senate itself has in the past decided that it could question the primaries, and has done so, and the committees of the Senate have gone into primary after primary in the last few years, and certainly within the knowledge of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, some time ago I started to answer the Senator from Idaho with respect to the sufficiency of the evidence.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question before he leaves the point we have been debating?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. To help those of us who want to read the decision, will the Senator give us the title of the case, the place where we can find it either in the hearings or in the briefs or in the court reports of Alabama? I refer to both opinions, the majority and the minority.

Mr. LONG. There were two decisions, one in the Lett case and one in another case.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Lett case is Two hundred and eleventh Alabama, page 423; One hundred and twenty-ninth Southern, page 33.

Mr. NORRIS. Is that the same case?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; that is the same case. I had it here on my desk.

Mr. NORRIS. Where will it be found in the Alabama Reports?

Mr. HASTINGS. Two hundred and twenty-first Alabama, page 423.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the Lett case?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is the Lett case.

Mr. NORRIS. The one I am particularly anxious to read is the Wilkinson case. I do not know who the defendant was.

Mr. HASTINGS. I will get that a little later.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Before the Senator leaves that point I hope the Senator from Nebraska will give me his attention for just a moment while I make this statement:

No court has any jurisdiction in any primary election or general election except such as specifically is conferred upon the court. In other words, primary and general elections are outside the jurisdiction of courts unless the statute specifically gives them a right to inquire into them.

A further very well-known rule of law is this: Where the statute does give the courts jurisdiction, or by jurisprudence it has been held that they have jurisdiction, they have usually and as a matter of very uniform jurisprudence held that the right of a candidate seeking to force his name to be placed on a ballot must be asserted by mandamus against the committee and that the candidate is the only man who can bring that action.

The Alabama jurisprudence is no different, I think, than the jurisprudence of Nebraska or Pennsylvania, and I know it is no different than that of Louisiana. The contestant in this case had two remedies. If he thought that under the law of Alabama this action of the committee was illegal, he had a right to go into court by a mandamus proceeding, and to compel his name to be written on the ballot if the law was with him, because the court of Alabama in the very Lett case that the Senator from Delaware has read said that there was a remedy by mandamus.

He not only did not go into the court in his own name—and the law is certainly clear that the right to run for office or claim the title to office is personal to the candidate, and to no other man—he not only did not go into court in his own name, but he went in under the name of an attorney, which no jurisprudence supports; and he did not bring the kind of action that any lawyer looking up the question of elections at all would have brought, one of mandamus to compel his name to be written on the ballot.

Having failed to exert that right, what did he do? He had the right to pass it over, and I say to you that under the jurisprudence in the Lett case he was very wise to pass it over, because I can not for the life of me see how the court could have said what it said in the Lett case and could have sustained any action that could have been brought by the contestant under that Alabama statute.

Let us say, however, that he did. He had the right to go into the court of Alabama. He had the right, if the law was with him, to have his name put on that ballot; and there was a court saying, "If you will bring a mandamus proceeding you have a standing in this court to put your name on the ballot if the law gives you that right." Instead of doing that, however, he waived whatever right he had under that law, and proposed to take his chances in a general election, and to put his name on the ballot against the candidate who had been nominated in the primary.

With the law as clear as it is, it seems very clear that the State having given this man every right in the world to settle the matter in the courts of the State, and he having decided not to settle it in the courts of the Sate, and then having decided to take the remedy in a general election, there would be no such thing as State sovereignty, when the State had gone that far to give that man every redress that he could have under the law, if now the Senate should decide that the primary was illegal.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I will answer the Senator from Nebraska by giving him a reference to the Wilkinson case. It is found in 221 Ala. 254; 128 Southern 362; 70 A. L. R. 712. The title of the case is Wilkinson, appellant, against Hendrick, appellee.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HASTINGS. Now, I desire to address myself to the question of sufficiency, the kind of fraud that it is necessary to show. I have here extracts from some decisions in the House of Representatives, and I think some in the Senate.

The first is the case of Butts against Mackey, second South Carolina district, Forty-fourth Congress. The committee used this language:

> Every facility is furnished for fraud; and even where the election officers are honest, great frauds may be readily committed without there being any practical means of detecting them. It is indispensable to a fair election that the electors shall be required to vote in the precinct where they reside.

Again, in the case of Platt against Goode, from Virginia, Senator Blackburn, while in the House, in the Forty-fourth Congress, said:

> The statute of Virginia requires that one of the poll books of election shall be put under cover and seal and sent to the county or corporation court clerk, together with the ballots, inclosed and sealed. There can be no question as to the mandatory character of this statute. Its object is to prevent fraud in tampering with the ballots or alteration of the returns.
> The rule laid down and supported by a number of adjudicated cases and applied in several instances by this House does not require that positive proof shall be adduced showing that the ballots have been tampered with. It is sufficient to show that opportunity for such tampering has been afforded. * * * We can not but conclude, in the light of the testimony, * * * that the vote of Bland and Rives Townships in the county of Prince Georges should be rejected.

In the case of Abbott against Frost, fourth Massachusetts district, decided in 1876, the House committee held that the poll must be excluded where the votes and returns were sent in to the county seat by one not officially authorized to carry them, unless it was proven that while the returns were out of legal custody they were not tampered with. That is virtually shifting the burden of proof. The House approved and adopted the report. (Smith's Contested Election Cases, 594 to 649.)

In that case the House committee observed:

> This testimony, we think, clearly shows that many of the plainest and most important provisions of the law were recklessly disregarded, if not purposely disobeyed, by the officers having in charge said election. * * * We are clearly of the opinion that the provisions of the statute which have been so totally and unblushingly disregarded in this case are not merely formal and directory, but vital and essential in order to render the election fair and free from fraud or the suspicion of fraud; for we hold it to be the duty of election officers so to conduct the election and everything thereunto appertaining as to as carefully guard against suspicion of or opportunity for fraud as fraud itself. Nothing short of this will satisfy either the spirit or letter of the statute made and enacted to protect and maintain the purity of elections.

The House committee in that case very evidently acted upon the principle of the rule declared by Mr. McCrary, chairman of the House committee in the Forty-second Congress, who, in the discussion of the case of Gooding against Wilson in that Congress, on the floor of the House said:

> I think another rule must be observed. It must appear that the ballots have been securely kept, that they have not been exposed, and that there has been no opportunity to tamper with them. This ought to appear affirmatively.

Another man who participated in the debate in the House in the case of Gooding against Wilson, in the Forty-second Congress, was the great constitutional lawyer and statesman, George Frisbie Hoar, of Massachusetts, then a Member of the House, but who was later to adorn the Senate for many years with the greatness of his character and patriotism, and to enlighten its counsels with his profound knowledge of statecraft and constitutional law. Senator Hoar, of course, knew that to contaminate the source of the election of Members of the Congress was to lay the ax at the very foundation of representative government, and anything that cast suspicion upon the election of Senators and Representatives affected him with horror. He recognized that the only way to preserve elections from suspicion was for the election officers faithfully to observe the essential safeguards and rules laid down by statute for the protection of the purity and honesty of the ballot, and that no election deserves to be recognized where these safeguards have not been observed. Mr. Hoar said, in the debate to which I have just referred:

> It makes no difference for the purpose of my point whether the ballot box was there in an exposed place for 12 hours or 12 days. Now, I do not claim that there is any evidence here that * * * any person entered it, opened that box and substituted other numbered ballots for the ballots which it contained. All I have to say is that an adroitness less than that practiced for a less important purpose in many ordinary cases of crime, robbery, burglary, and forgery, could easily accomplish that result. Now we know how eager, how unscrupulous, how adroit, in many instances, are the means which are used to affect political contests. It is not the question whether the friends of the very respectable and very able gentleman who claims this seat did, or were capable of doing such a thing * * *. The interests of the sitting Member and of the contestant disappear before a question like this, which involves the interests of the American people in the establishment and maintenance of a strict, wise, and safe rule of public policy. It is not merely a question whether the recount was correct; it is a question whether you know and are sure that the thing counted upon the recount was the same thing that was counted, or should have been counted, at the time the original count was made.
> If at an election of Representative the check list be flung aside and votes are indiscriminately crowded into the ballot box without an inspection by the moderator, it must be obvious to all observing citizens that every evil which the statute was designed to remedy is likely to happen, and that two prominent provisions of it will be trampled under foot. Votes so given and received are neither given nor received in conformity to the essential requisitions of the statute, and, such requisitions being violated, the votes must be void. They would be no more void if given viva voce rather than by ballot. If such a neglect of the statute will not render the whole proceedings void, what neglect will have that operation? The whole balloting, therefore, in this manner is vitiated; no Representative can thus be duly elected.
> In determining the title to the county office, the vote of a township should be excluded where it appears that in such township the mandatory provision requiring the official ballots to be kept in the custody of an inspector was violated by the appointment of an unofficial person as "instructor" to distribute the ballots, and allowing him access to the voters even after they had entered the booths, although the parties acted in good faith, and it is not shown that voters were unduly influenced.

The text-writer of Corpus Juris might well have been thinking of the Alabama Senatorial election of 1930 when he laid down in volume 20, page 183, the following rule:

An election will be vitiated by irregularities which are so numerous that they must be attributed to fraud rather than honest mistake; and although no actual fraud is apparent, yet an election will be invalidated where the whole conduct of the election officers shows such gross negligence and disregard of their official duties as to leave the judicial mind in doubt as to how the election resulted except for such widespread irregularities. (Hawood v. Cooper, 36th Cong., First Bartlett 275.)

Gross irregularities and palpable violations of law in conducting an election * * * should cause the rejection of the entire poll.

It is sometimes a difficult matter to decide whether misconduct on the part of the election officers is to be regarded as constituting fraud or as only the result of carelessness, ignorance, or negligence. If, however, such misconduct has the effect to destroy the integrity of the returns, and avoid the prima facie character which they ought to bear, such returns will be rejected and other proof demanded of each vote relied upon. And this is the rule concerning such misconduct whether it be shown to have been fraudulent; that is to say, prompted by a corrupt purpose, or whether it arise from a reckless disregard of the law or from ignorance of its requirements.

This fact was expressly recognized by the House committee in the case of Moore against Funston in the Fifty-third Congress, where the House committee observed:

The difficulty of establishing by legal evidence the existence of a conspiracy, generally great, is increased rather than lessened by the intermingling of politics. That this is so is apparent from the well-known fact that even where an entire community is convinced to a moral certainty that gross frauds have been perpetrated in an election in the execution of a studied effort to defraud, a sufficient amount of legal evidence to convict the suffrage assassins is rarely found, and usually enough of such evidence can not be procured to indict them. All text writers or other law authorities treating of the subject recognize the difficulty of proving a conspiracy by direct evidence; and, as in the case of fraud in general, recognize also the propriety, as well as the necessity, of proving distinct facts, many of them insignificant in themselves, from all of which, however, when sufficient, a firm belief in the existence of the conspiracy or fraud may safely be deduced, and the conclusion may be as safely acted upon. In many cases circumstantial evidence is the only evidence which can be obtained, and it is also not infrequently of the most satisfactory and convincing character.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Costigan	Kean	Schall
Austin	Couzens	Kendrick	Sheppard
Bailey	Cutting	La Follette	Shipstead
Bankhead	Dickinson	Lewis	Shortridge
Barbour	Dill	Logan	Smith
Barkley	Fletcher	Long	Smoot
Bingham	Frazier	McGill	Steiwer
Black	George	McKellar	Stephens
Blaine	Glass	McNary	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	Goldsborough	Metcalf	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Gore	Moses	Townsend
Brookhart	Hale	Neely	Trammell
Broussard	Harrison	Norbeck	Tydings
Bulkley	Hastings	Norris	Vandenberg
Bulow	Hatfield	Nye	Wagner
Byrnes	Hayden	Oddie	Walcott
Capper	Hebert	Patterson	Waterman
Caraway	Howell	Pittman	Watson
Carey	Hull	Reed	Wheeler
Copeland	Jones	Robinson, Ind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-two Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I should like to take up the particular sections of the statutes of Alabama, and show how nearly they were complied with, or, putting it the other way, how often they were violated.

Section 404 of the Code of Alabama provides that:

Each ballot shall be numbered by one of the inspectors to correspond to the number of the voter voting the same on the poll list. A voter may write his name on the ballot. The number corresponding with the voter's name on the poll list must be plainly entered in ink on the back of the ballot of the voter.

In the figures I am about to give there must be excluded three counties, where the boxes were not secured by the committee, because the ballots had been burned some time prior to the adoption of the resolution of investigation by the Senate, as I recollect it.

Two thousand and forty-three boxes were examined. The boxes wherein the ballots were numbered in pencil numbered 1,361, the boxes wherein the ballots were numbered in ink numbered 125, and the boxes wherein the ballots were not numbered at all numbered 557. Fifty-eight thousand eight hundred and seventeen ballots, or 26.3 per cent of the vote, were not numbered in any way. Thirty-five thousand seven hundred and ninety-five, or 16 per cent of the vote, were properly numbered. The rest of them were numbered in pencil.

I think it worth while to call attention to the fact that the officers who failed to number these ballots made themselves liable in the State of Alabama under section 3937 of the code, which provides that:

Any person or persons who do any act defined or declared to be a corrupt practice under the election or primary laws of this State—

And this has been so defined in the law—

must be fined not more than $500, and may also be imprisoned in the county jail or sentenced to hard labor for the county for not more than six months, at the discretion of the court trying the case.

It is true that in Alabama it has been decided that this provision with respect to the numbering of the ballots is not a mandatory provision, and in the absence of fraud the votes may be counted. The case in which that was decided went to the court upon an agreed statement of facts in which it was definitely stated on both sides that there was no fraud in connection with the election.

I pass from that to section 456, which provides:

456. Returns of election; how made and duty of probate judge: One copy of the certificate of the result of the election shall be signed by the inspectors and inclosed in an envelope, which shall then be securely sealed, and each of the inspectors shall write his name across every fold at which the envelope, if unfastened, could be opened. Said envelope, with certificate inclosed, shall be at once delivered to the returning officer of the precinct, who shall deliver the same in the condition received to the judge of probate. The judge of probate shall keep and preserve the same unopened until the board of supervisors meet to ascertain the result of the election. In case of loss, mutilation, or absence of the original certificate of the result of the election by the inspectors of any voting place the envelope shall be opened and the copy therein shall be accepted as a certificate of the result of the election for that voting place.

The number of official envelopes, papers, and so forth, requiring signatures, and apparently signed by one person, amounted to 1,842.

Section 457 provides that "the poll list shall be sealed in an envelope before the inspectors begin to count the votes, and shall not be opened." The purpose of this was to make sure that the ballot was a secret ballot. The number of boxes wherein the poll lists were found loose was 222. The number of boxes wherein the poll list was found with ballots was two.

Section 459: The number of boxes wherein certification of the poll lists was not complete was 643.

Section 459 is the section requiring that the oath be administered.

The number of boxes wherein the stubs were not initialed was 543.

Section 493 provides for the initialing of the ballots:

After preparing his ballot the elector shall fold the same so as to conceal the face thereof and show the stub thereto attached with the name or the initial of the inspector and hand it to the receiving inspector. The inspector must receive the ballot folded and call the name of the elector audibly and distinctly, and the name of each elector whose ballot has been received must immediately be taken down by the clerks on separate lists, which shall be headed "Names of voters" and called "Poll lists," and the number of the order in which such elector votes must at the same time be entered by each clerk against his name, the first elector voting being numbered 1, the second 2, and so on, to the last elector voting.

Section 494: The number of boxes wherein the stubs were not detached from the ballots was 651.

Section 498 provides for the challenging of voters. The incomplete challenges found by the committee were 2,335.

Section 505 is the section which requires that—

As soon as the ballots are all counted the inspectors must ascertain the number of votes received for each person and for what office, and must make a statement of the same in writing, which statement must be signed by them; they must also certify in writing on one of the poll lisis that such poll list is the poll list of the election precinct at which they were inspected, the day and year on which such election was held, and for what offices, which certificates must be signed by them; and such statement of the poll lists and votes thus certified must be sealed up, together with a list of the registered voters in such precinct at such election on such day, in a box to be furnished by the sheriff of the county, one or more for each precinct, and to consist of wood, tin, or sheet iron, and securely fastened by locks, directed to the sheriff of the county, if there be one, and if none, then to the person discharging the duties of such office, and immediately deliver the same to the returning officer of the precinct.

With respect to that one section, the number of boxes wherein the qualified lists were not found was 569; the number of boxes wherein the poll lists were not found in official envelopes for that purpose and were taken from the sheriff's was 135; the number of boxes wherein certificates of results were not found in envelopes for that purpose and were taken from the sheriff's was 412; the number of boxes wherein no certificates of results were found was 411; the number of boxes wherein certificates were not sealed was 1,119; the number of ballot boxes wherein no poll lists were found at all, 31; the number of ballot boxes wherein no poll lists were found in ballot boxes, 99.

Section 506 relates to the sealing of boxes. There may be some little dispute about the number of boxes not sealed. I think it is contended by Mr. Bankhead and his counsel that it is less than 1,087. However, 1,087 is the figure given me by the supervisor; but a difference of 100 is not great. The number of boxes wherein the ballots were found loose was 576. The number of boxes wherein the ballots were found folded was 1,543.

Mr. President, in the report filed by the minority I have called attention to this point which to me is quite significant. There were 634 inspectors and 453 clerks who failed to subscribe to the oath. In 349 election districts the returning officers did not subscribe to the oath. I had not called particular attention to that fact until I had read a part of the remarks made by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] in the Vare case in which he called attention to this fact as being important, and for that reason I have placed it in the report.

But here is the particular thing that I think is important. Section 437 of the Alabama Code provides for the appointment of inspectors and clerks "from the qualified electors of the respective voting places" 15 days before the election. The records show 260 inspectors and 22 clerks were not qualified electors in the election districts in which they served; that 62 returning officers were not qualified electors in the precincts in which they served.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Is the Senator reading that from the record, may I ask?

Mr. HASTINGS. I am reading from page 2 of the report.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask the Senator if any evidence was introduced before the committee establishing the fact that 260 inspectors and 22 clerks were not qualified electors?

Mr. HASTINGS. There may be some dispute between the Senator and myself as to what he means by "evidence." It is in evidence by an examination of the paraphernalia, the election machinery, showing those facts. I do not know whether the attention of the committee or anybody was called to it until this time.

Mr. BLACK. May I ask the Senator if he himself has examined any records which show there were 260 inspectors who were not qualified electors; and if so, where is that record?

Mr. HASTINGS. By "record," does the Senator mean a statement that was made up by somebody for me?

Mr. BLACK. I am asking where the Senator got the information, whether anybody testified to it or whether the Senator has any facts upon which he bases it?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; I have.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I shall be obliged to make this statement for the RECORD. There was never any evidence as to this fact; there was never any fact presented to the committee until after the committee had finished its work, when I received information that the supervisor was engaged in making up a list of the character to which the Senator is now referring. It never has been submitted to me and it never has been submitted to the subcommittee. If it has ever been submitted to the full committee, I have no knowledge of it at all. I do not think the Senator ought to put anything in here that was never submitted to the subcommittee, never brought to the attention of the subcommittee, and never brought to the attention of the full committee so far as I know from having the same presented to me as a member of that committee.

Mr. HASTINGS. There may be some impropriety in my doing this. It is a tabulation of facts from the record.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator permit me to say that that is exactly why the Senator ought not to do it? The only information I have received about it is a statement that in point of fact the alleged facts were not facts proven, and I said, "Very well; if there is anything like that offered, you have a right to be heard."

Mr. HASTINGS. As a matter of fact was not this list handed to either Senator Bankhead or his counsel? Has not he seen the very list about which the Senator is now inquiring?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know, but after we had closed the case I learned through Senator Bankhead or his counsel, I do not remember which, that the supervisor was then engaged in making up such a list. I then said, if that list was presented to the committee, he, of course, would have a right to learn about it, and he would have a right to make an examination of the facts alleged to be disclosed by it. But I have never seen the list.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. This was called to my attention along about the time the evidence closed. Telegrams were sent to various probate judges and replies received. If the Senator is going to place in the RECORD this ex parte statement of the supervisor, it will certainly be proper that there be placed in the RECORD a statement of the probate judges hastily obtained, which will show that more than 75 per cent of the statements made by the supervisor are wholly incorrect. We absolutely know that if the matter is investigated it will show that to be the fact.

The only possible basis for such a charge is that in some cases a man's name might be on one list in a particular way and perhaps not in exactly the same identical way that it might be on another list.

It was my desire to call the attention of the Senator to the matter at this time because of the fact that I am not qualified to produce the telegrams of the probate judges; but, of course, if it is stated in the record that there were hundreds of election officers who were disqualified, it would make it absolutely imperative to place the telegrams from the probate judges in the record. My judgment is that neither would have a proper place here now, and that this statement should not be presented, because it is not in evidence.

Mr. HASTINGS. I will state my view with respect to it. I think either side would have a right from the evidence in hand to make such calculations as it may be able to make from the evidence; that is, that it is possible for me to go to the files as a member of the committee and to discover there certain facts which I think ought to be brought to the attention of the Senate. It might be done by me and brought directly to the Senate without any impropriety at all. That is my thought about it.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, let me say right there that I am not going to question the propriety, but I am going to say to the Senator now that the facts which he is about to state were definitely and positively stated to me to be incorrect, and I therefore dismissed the matter unless the facts were offered in some formal way in evidence.

Mr. HASTINGS. Let me continue a moment further. I had not seen this list to which I was about to refer until about the time I started to prepare the minority report. My attention was immediately attracted to the importance of it, and for that reason I wrote into the views of the minority those facts and expected to discuss them. I want to be careful not to do anything here which is unfair to either side, and I shall, for that reason, not touch upon that subject for the present, at least, without conferring with my colleagues upon the committee with respect to it.

There are, to my mind, some important things here which are somewhat controlling. I think it is true that when one examines a ballot box and finds that the ballots inside have not been numbered, attention is immediately attracted to the fact that the law has been violated.

If, however, it is found that those ballots have not been rolled and sealed as the law provides, then suspicion becomes greater, and one wonders what has happened to that particular ballot box. Then if it is found that on the outside of the box the seal itself has been broken, I think it exacts from somebody an explanation of that particular fact. I think I ought to have reversed the sequence. When one finds the seal of the boxes broken and goes inside and finds the seal of the ballots broken or the ballots not sealed as the law provides, and when he examines the ballots themselves and finds none of them numbered, I say those circumstances demand of the person who has received his election under such circumstances an explanation at the hands of the officers involved in that case.

If it be necessary to explain such facts, and there is suspicion attached to them, let us find out from the officer who had the ballot box in his custody why the particular box was open in that way. Let us find out from the election officer why the ballots were not sealed. If the man who has custody of the ballot box and the ballots gives a reasonable explanation as to why the ballot box was open and why the seal was broken, then we pass by that.

If the election officers at the same time give some good reason as to why the ballots were not sealed, then we will pass that and go to the next irregularity and find out why it was they were not numbered. However, I respectfully submit that when we find all three of these things together with many other irregularities in the same election, some of them affecting nearly every ballot box, that of itself makes it necessary for some clear and explicit explanation to be made as to what happened in Alabama.

I suggest that that question can not be answered by merely saying, "This has been our practice in Alabama for many years." That is not a sufficient answer. Considering the election laws of Alabama, when the election officials have been placed in a position where it is shown that they could have done numbers of things without anyone being able to detect them, then I say that the probability is not only that the laws of Alabama have been violated but they have been made practically null and void, so far as any good the public may be able to derive from them is concerned.

Can anyone look upon a situation like that without his suspicion being aroused as to fraud? Oh, but it is said, no one can be convicted of fraud upon suspicion. No; but all the rulings and precedents in election cases show that the facts must be looked to; and if suspicious circumstances are found creeping through the entire election machinery, it may very well be concluded that there was fraud in the particular election, and it may be declared that there was no election at all.

The Senator from New Mexico called attention to the fact that when the election was over the persons who made the election returns under the law were compelled to post notices on the doors of the proper buildings in various places; that they did so, and when they were examined by the newspapers and by the committee here they all agreed, so that there could not be any fraud there at all. One does not have to have much political experience to know that, in view of the way elections are conducted in Alabama, the ballots could have been stolen from every ballot box there without anyone being able subsequently to discover it.

It would have been the easiest thing in the world to do that. With a hatbox used as a ballot box, with one Heflin watcher there at the polling place—and in many instances the records show that he voted for Bankhead—in that kind of a case, does anyone mean to tell me that it was not possible for a designing election officer to slip 10 ballots from there, which were voted for Heflin, and put 10 ballots back, which were voted for Bankhead? It was an easy thing to do. With election officers anxious to control the situation, anxious to elect their particular candidate for office, it is not unreasonable for us to conclude that some ambitious man might make up his mind and say, "I will fix this particular box," and then to make a wrong return. That could have been easily done down there. Then the ballot box could have been taken to his home, and during the few days when he had that open ballot box, he could have changed the ballots to agree with the returns. Does anybody contend that that could not be done? Why is it insisted that the ballot boxes shall be sealed if it is not to prevent that sort of thing being done? How can anybody say it was not done when he finds the seals broken on the boxes? Can anybody say what happened? He can only speculate; he can not reach any definite conclusion with respect to it; it is impossible to do so.

It may be true for aught I know that there was substantial fraud sufficient to void the election; but I say that is not the sole point here. It was not the purpose of the committee to determine definitely whether it has been shown by the contestant that there was fraud openly committed and in such a way that one can put his finger upon it; that is not the question. The question is this, Have all the safeguards of the Alabama election laws been so violated that it can not possibly be determined definitely whether there was fraud or whether there was not fraud?

Somebody may say that I am undertaking to prove a negative; that everybody is presumed to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty, and that fraud is never presumed, and all that. That is all very true until it is found that some safeguard has been broken down, and the minute that safeguard is found gone, then it is proper to inquire what has happened, what has destroyed it, and why was it destroyed, and who has profited by its destruction. That is the inquiry we must make in a case like this. It is the only inquiry which can ever be made in order definitely to satisfy ourselves with respect to the result.

The law provides that the ballots shall be retained by the sheriff for a period of six months, and the boxes shall not be opened and the ballots shall not be unrolled except in case of a contest. In the investigation of this election case the ballots in three of the counties could not be found; the ballots were burned shortly after the election. Who can tell whether they were burned for the purpose of preventing their effect upon this contest? Nobody can tell that. The man who burned them is not going to admit it; but what are we going to do with those three counties in a case like this? Can we do anything more than to mark off entirely the ballots there cast and say that those counties are out? Of course not. It is the only way in which we can approach a determination of the question.

Mr. President, consider that evidence, and then consider this further evidence which is very significant in this case: The evidence is uncontroverted that it was not only permissible but it was the practice of both parties to pay the poll tax of some of the voters.

The law distinctly provides that it shall be unlawful for one person or organization to pay the poll tax of another person, and makes it a criminal offense to do so, but witnesses went upon the stand and said that it was not only permissible but that it was the practice of both parties to raise money in the month of January in order that they might pay the poll tax before the 1st of February of citizens who expected to vote at the ensuing election. There is evidence in the testimony—it does not amount to very much, but the counsel for Mr. Heflin called attention to it—that about the month of January, 1930, a check for $25 was given by Mr. Bankhead for campaign purposes, and the inference was drawn that that money was used in order to pay the poll tax of other persons. However, the charge which I have just stated is not denied at all by Senator Bankhead, namely—and the practice is general—that the poll tax of some voters was paid by others; that such was the practice in Alabama. Senator Bankhead, however, did say that, so far as he knew, that practice is limited to two counties in the State of Alabama. I do not know whether it is limited to two counties or whether it is not, but I say in every county where it is practiced we must of necessity throw out the ballots and say that they can not be counted.

So, with one regulation after another broken, with one safeguard after another gone, I say in the end we can not reach any conclusion and the Senate can not possibly determine who was elected in Alabama by the people of Alabama.

Fifty-eight thousand ballots were not numbered at all. The law distinctly says that they shall be numbered. In the failure to number the ballots and the failure to seal the ballots alone there were 11,000 violations of the law by the election officers of Alabama, and every violation subjected the person to a fine of $500 and six months in jail.

In the Pennsylvania case fraud was proved by proving that in Pittsburgh some people were sent to jail for election frauds and that in Philadelphia likewise some people were sent to jail for election frauds. Is it contended, Mr. President, in this case because nobody in Alabama has been sent to jail for these violations we can not prove that they did not occur? Taking into consideration the various ballots which have been rejected because the voters were not on the poll lists and the other irregularities, while I have not tried to count them all, I have no doubt, if they were counted, that we could find a hundred thousand violations, and, so far as I know, not a single, solitary soul has been prosecuted for the violation of these important laws.

These laws are as good election laws as can be found in any State of the Union. Alabama has every reason to be proud of them; but why should such laws as these be passed, if nobody pays any attention at all to them?

The particular law in which counsel for Senator Bankhead is interested is the law which relates to the fraud that must be proved before an election can be vitiated in Alabama. If I were called to pass upon it, I should say that if that was anything it might very well be considered a joker in this law. While, however, the laws of Alabama ought to have a persuasive influence upon the Senate, and while I have been urging that the Senate in this matter must throw out this election because of the great number of violations of those laws, when it comes to the Alabama law saying that an election shall not be vitiated because of fraud unless it can be shown that one person secured more valid votes than some other, I respectfully submit that when they ask the United States Senate to do that they might just as well have written into the law, "Except that so far as a United States Senator is concerned, the laws of Alabama shall not be passed upon by them."

In other words, the effect of this law which counsel for Senator Bankhead urges upon the Senate is to say that the United States Senate, with all the powers it has, can never successfully investigate an election in the State of Alabama. That is what I think it says, and that is what I think the Senate is not bound to follow. What we ought to do here is to look these facts and figures in the face without prejudice, without any thought of doing injury, and without any thought of doing favor to one person or to another.

I say that the violation of the election laws of Alabama in 1930 is a scandal upon American political history, and it ought not to be left in any such shape as that. The United States Senate ought to have more regard for itself. The State of Alabama ought to have more regard for itself. Its representatives ought to have more regard for it than to come here and attempt to justify what has been done by the election officers in the State of Alabama. Either abolish your law and elect your people at a town meeting, or, if you are going to insist upon having a valid law and one that is quite worth while, then, I say, help the rest of us to help you support it.

Mr. BLACK obtained the floor.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATFIELD in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. May I have the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY]? It is now late in the afternoon. The Senator from Alabama expects to speak at some length. Since it will be impossible for him to conclude his address this afternoon, does not the Senator from Oregon think we might as well recess at this time until noon to-morrow?

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, does the Senator from Alabama desire to go forward until 5 o'clock this evening?

Mr. BLACK. It is satisfactory to me to do either way.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senators that we might proceed with the Department of Justice bill for the remaining time this afternoon. I am rather inclined to think we might get it through in that time. I hope so.

Mr. MCNARY. That would hardly be carrying out the spirit of the day. A good many Senators desire to be here when the Senator brings up his appropriation bill; and it would not be quite right to start in on an appropriation bill without warning and notice in advance.

Mr. JONES. Very well.

Mr. MCNARY. I think it would be well for the Senator from Alabama to proceed for a few moments, and about 5 o'clock we will take a recess until to-morrow.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, the peroration of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], in which he made the statement that the Alabama election of 1930 was a scandal upon the political history of the Nation, might be startling to those who are not familiar with the facts in the case. It is a little surprising that the Senator from Delaware should use such strong and violent language with reference to an election when he has admitted upon the floor that there is not one vestige of evidence, not one place upon which he can put his finger, to show that there was any fraud or corruption.

It is startling in the extreme for the Senator from Delaware to stand upon the floor of this body and assert in substance that the people of Alabama and the representatives of the people of Alabama should be ashamed of an election when he has talked for three hours and has not yet presented one word or one sentence or one paragraph which shows, or tends to show, that there was any fraud in that election.

It is true that the Senator from Delaware has established to his own satisfaction that there was opportunity for fraud. Was it necessary to spend three hours in order to establish that in any election ever held in the world there was opportunity for fraud? Has the time come in the political history of the Nation when all we do is to say, "There was opportunity for fraud, and therefore there must have been fraud"?

That may apply to Delaware. It may be true that in some of the States of this Union the mere fact that there is an opportunity for fraud establishes the fact that there was fraud; but I deny that there is any reason to apply any such rule to the State of Alabama.

Mr. President, I listened with great interest to the emphatic statement with reference to the number of law violations that occurred in Alabama—100,000, we are told, and I reply to this first because it was the last remark of the Senator—100,000 instances of law violation on the part of the election managers and officers in the State of Alabama. That is the statement of the Senator from Delaware. In order to make it more emphatic, he calls attention in his report to the fact that for each violation there was likely to be imposed a fine of $500 and six months in jail. Serious as this is to the Senator from Delaware, he calls attention to the fact that in 125,000 instances there was a violation of law.

In order that I might reach some conclusion, as he made his remarks, as to the seriousness of this charge as he stated that each violation subjected some one to a fine of $500, I made some figures; and I found that according to the idea of the Senator from Delaware—who says that unfortunately no one has been put in jail—they have subjected themselves, in his 100,000 instances, to fines of $50,000,000.

What is this crime, what is this serious offense for which the Senator from Delaware, in his extreme sensitiveness, would impose a penalty of $50,000,000 upon the people of Alabama who served in the election offices? They wrote with a pencil instead of writing with a pen!

I concluded that I would find out, as the Senator progressed with his talk, how much punishment he would impose upon these gentlemen and ladies, some of whom were the managers and clerks for Senator Heflin, who had written with a pencil instead of writing with a pen. It seems to be proper, according to the judgment of the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], to say that the Alabama election should be likened to the Pennsylvania and Illinois elections by reason of these law violations which he emphasizes. So, Mr. President, I found out that if the Senator's views should be put into effect, and each of these Alabama citizens should have imposed the fine which the Senator seems to indicate they should have for the serious offense of writing with a pencil instead of a pen, those election officers would be subjected to a punishment of 2,319,408 months in jail. The Senator said that there were 128,856 violations of law. Did he tell you what those violations of law were?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HASTINGS. I did not say that.

Mr. BLACK. Why, it is in the Senator's printed report that I have before me.

Mr. HASTINGS. What did the Senator say—128,000?

Mr. BLACK. One hundred and twenty-eight thousand eight hundred and fifty-six.

Mr. HASTINGS. Violations of law?

Mr. BLACK. Writing with a pencil instead of a pen; and the Senator stated immediately afterwards that each one was a separate violation, and he quoted the statute.

Mr. HASTINGS. I did not say there were 128,856 violations of law. That is what I deny.

Mr. BLACK. Let me read what the Senator said.

Mr. HASTINGS. I wish the Senator would read the language to which he refers.

Mr. BLACK. I shall be delighted to do it. How many does the Senator say there were? Of course the Senator on the floor said "100,000," but I happen to have the report made by the Senator in which he gives, as a part of his cumulative opportunity for fraud, 128,000 instances in which people wrote with a pencil instead of a pen.

Mr. HASTINGS. There is no such thing in the report.

Mr. BLACK. I shall be glad to read it to the Senator.

Mr. HASTINGS. What report does the Senator refer to?

Mr. BLACK. I am referring to the report signed with the name of the Senator from Delaware at the head, Mr. HASTINGS. Now I shall read from it.

Mr. HASTINGS. What page of the report, please?

Mr. BLACK. Page 8. I shall read some of the other serious violations. One of the other violations for which the Senator would have the election managers sent to jail is folding the ballots instead of rolling them. I realize that there is a difference between folding and rolling.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator promised to read from the report upon the question of the 128,856 violations.

Mr. BLACK. Which I expect to do.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the Senator do so now?

Mr. BLACK. I shall do so in a moment. I want to call attention, in the second place, however, to the combination of law violations to which the Senator refers, the other being that the ballots were folded instead of being rolled.

Section 3937 of the Code provides:

> Any person or persons who do any act defined or declared to be a corrupt practice under the election or primary election laws of this State * * * must be fined not more than $500, and may also be imprisoned in the county jail or sentenced to hard labor for the county for not more than six months at the discretion of the court trying the case.

Following that he said:

> I have heretofore pointed out that the Alabama law requires the inspectors of elections to number each ballot in ink. This number corresponds with a number on the poll list. The secrecy of the ballot is secured by providing that before the count is started the poll list be sealed and not again opened. It will be observed from this report that 35,795 ballots, or 16 per cent, were properly numbered; 128,856, or 57.7 per cent, were numbered in pencil, and that 58,817, or 26.3 per cent, were not numbered at all.

Continuing further the Senator says:

> It further appears that out of a total of 2,043 boxes the ballots in only 125 of them were properly numbered.

Going on to the next paragraph, he said:

> Mr. Heflin's representative has emphasized the fact that the case here is different from that in that fraud is here alleged, but I have read the decision with great care and I am satisfied that the facts so far disclosed would not justify the committee in refusing to count these ballots for the reason that they had not been properly numbered.
> Take another illustration, which I think is of considerable importance.

Following immediately after the pencil-and-pen statement in the Senator's report, he said:

> The law requires that the ballots that have been counted shall be rolled and sealed and returned to the ballot box and the ballot box shall be sealed and the ballots shall remain in the box for a period of six months, except in case of a contest. Out of the total of 2,043 boxes, in 1,543 of them the ballots were found folded instead of rolled and sealed and in 576 boxes they were found loose, both of these irregularities frequently occuring in the same box.

In other words, sometimes they would find them folded; sometimes they would find them loose.

There were but 19 boxes.

> There were but 19 boxes where the ballots were properly rolled and sealed. It was the duty of the inspectors of election to see that these ballots were rolled and sealed. They failed to do it. This makes every officer guilty of an additional crime under the Alabama Code, as above outlined.

The Senator has given a code section, and then he starts off with the way the election officers became criminals as they violated that section, and his first illustration is that there were 128,856 election managers and clerks in Alabama who wrote with a pencil instead of with a pen.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I ask the Senator to point out where I said what he says I said.

Mr. BLACK. I have just read it. The Senator stated that there were 100,000 violations. Can the Senator figure up a hundred thousand violations without taking the ballots which were marked with a pencil instead of with a pen?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; I think so.

Mr. BLACK. What would the Senator include?

Mr. HASTINGS. There were some 30,000 illegal votes cast, and the persons casting the illegal votes were guilty under this law. I assume that there were probably seven or eight thousand absentee ballots cast which were illegal, and thus violations of the law. Then, if we take all of these violations of the officers, the many violations set out, I suspect we would not be far from 100,000. But may I call the Senator's attention to the fact that on page 9 I have called attention to the fact that in the numbering of the ballots and the failure to roll them there were 11,826 violations of law? The Senator can defend those violations, but I am perfectly satisfied they were violations.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is trying to get away from his first charge. He has heralded all over the United States of of America that in hundreds of thousands of instances the people of Alabama have violated the law, and in order to reach that conclusion he has had to get down to a discussion and an enumeration of people writing with a pencil instead of with a pen.

What were his three classes of violations of law? Let us see. First, he says, they did not number some of the ballots. In other instances they numbered them with a pencil instead of with a pen. In other instances they folded the ballots instead of rolling the ballots, a terrible crime, one which has aroused the sensitive instincts of the Senator who puts at the end of his report the statement that all that is necessary to prove fraud is to prove that somebody had an opportunity to commit fraud. In other words, it may be true that there are some who adopt the principle in this life that all that is necessary to convict a good citizen of fraud is to prove he had a chance to commit fraud; but that is contrary to the primary principles of American jurisprudence; it is contrary to the primary principles of justice and of right. If the time has come in America when one can get up on the floor of the Senate and charge that the action of a whole people is a scandal in our political history simply because of the fact that they had a chance to commit fraud, and find such a body as this following him, then we have come upon sad times in America.

Mr. President, I am delighted to know that, with the careful scrutiny of the Senator from Delaware and the inspectors and supervisors from over this country who have looked with a microscope into the Alabama election of 1930, they have been compelled in the final analysis, when they come to the Senate floor, to say, not that fraud was committed here and fraud was committed there, but, as they look with their microscope, they come back into the Senate and say on the Senate floor, "There was an opportunity for fraud in Alabama; therefore we ask you to clear Pennsylvania and Illinois."

There is no similarity between this case and the elections in Pennsylvania and Illinois, which were the subjects of investigation by this body. In those States the evidence showed corruption. In this case the Senator from Delaware has been compelled to admit on the floor that the evidence does not show corruption in Alabama. I challenge him now, if he has any evidence of any money being spent in Alabama wrongfully, to let the Senate know of it. I challenge him now, if he has any of the evidence we have been hearing about in the papers, that dead people voted, to get up and tell the Senate and the country about it. I will wait for a reply. I challenge him now—and I shall wait for a reply—to produce any evidence that thousands of votes were fraudulently cast in Alabama. He will not do it, because there is no such evidence in the record. Neither he nor anyone else, on the other side or on this side, or anywhere in the United States of America, can produce proof of fraud and corruption in that election.

I have taken up these matters first because they constituted the closing remarks of the address of the Senator from Delaware. It is my expectation to discuss to-morrow the question of the primary and its effect, but I am glad to have this opportunity, immediately after the discussion by the Senator from Delaware, to reassert that there is no evidence of fraud in this record, unless we have come to the point where we must stoop so low as to view with suspicion every opportunity for the commission of fraud. The Senate has not reached that point.

It is impossible to imagine a judicial body which would reach the conclusion that all that need be done in order to overturn the will of a majority of the people of a State was to show that there was opportunity for somebody to commit fraud.

Conventions are held in Delaware. Every time a convention is held in Delaware there is an opportunity for somebody to bribe a member of that convention. Every time there is a convention to nominate a candidate for United States Senator, or governor, or any other officer, there is an opportunity, by undercover methods, which are sometimes used in conventions, to thwart the will of the people. Every time they vote by secret ballot in Delaware in a convention or anywhere else there is an opportunity for fraud.

If that be true, whose seat is safe in this body? Can it be said that there was no opportunity for fraud in the last convention held in the State of Delaware, or in any other State in this Union? Can it be said that there was no opportunity for fraud in any primary held anywhere in this Nation? Yet the Senator from Delaware comes into this Chamber and seriously requests that sane men, sober men, honest men, men who have enough judgment to have reached the United States Senate, depart from the time-honored rule of presuming that people are innocent until they are proven guilty and hold that because there was an opportunity to defraud therefore there must have been fraud.

What state of mind could bring a man to reach such a conclusion as that? It is contrary to the first principles upon which this country rests with reference to the protection and safety of its citizens. The presumption of innocence is a part of the very warp and woof of our political life. Never before have I heard it challenged in this body. Yet, forsooth, because perchance 128,000 ballots were marked with a pencil instead of a pen and 50,000 were not marked at all; because some ballots were folded instead of being rolled; and because the seals of some boxes were broken, the Senator from Delaware says that there was an opportunity for fraud, and therefore we will talk about Alabama.

Mr. President, I do not believe it is possible, in this body, to bring a reasonable number of its Members to vote upon any such hypothesis as that. It is my intention to show to the Senate by the record in this case, which can not be disputed, that fraud has been successfully proven not to have existed. According to every measure which can be adopted by sane, reasonable, and just men, the will of the people of Alabama was fairly and justly expressed at the polls in November, 1930.

Mr. President, I desire to discuss briefly the question of the effect of the primary, but if I understood correctly the Senator from Oregon, it is his desire to recess at this time.

Mr. McNARY. It is.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATFIELD in the chair), as in executive session, laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, APRIL 22, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the heart of our hearts and the soul of our souls, sustain us with the courage of faith and with the light of hope. Allow these divinely inspired virtues to expel fear and anxiety and lead us on in the ways of right. Another Member, beloved and honored, has joined the ranks of the immortal dead. Bend to our prayer and bear company with us in our sorrow. Silent is that home as the companion of the years sits alone, looking out upon a barren earth, shadowed by that mysterious power that makes life's deep undertone. O Thou who art the messenger of sympathy and comfort, keep her close to that realm where angels have their birth and wear their garments of white and love through the eternal years. O Mighty God, hear us as our souls speak in tears of gratitude to Thee for the whisper of the Lord in our hearts: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away." We praise Thee that the river of life flows on forever and the light is above us and rest is before us. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate Resolution 205

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. EDWARD M. BEERS, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That a committee of 10 Senators be appointed by the President pro tempore to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative the Senate do now adjourn.

The message also announced that pursuant to the foregoing resolutions the President pro tempore had appointed Mr. REED, Mr. DAVIS, Mr. SHIPSTEAD, Mr. MOSES, Mr. VANDENBERG, Mr. DICKINSON, Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts, Mr. HAYDEN, and Mr. CAPPER members of the committee on the part of the Senate to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill and concurrent resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 929. An act relating to the taking of depositions in cases arising under section 19 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended;

RADIO ADVERTISING

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a talk I made on radio advertising before the annual convention of the American Association of Advertising Agencies.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to do so, I herewith insert in the RECORD a talk made by me at the radio session of the fifteenth annual meeting of the American Association of Advertising Agencies convened at the Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D. C., April 15, 1932:

Chairman Gamble, members of the association, and invited guests, we are exceedingly fortunate this afternoon to have gathered in this room the leading representatives of four of the most influential factors in radio—the Congress of the United States, the Federal Radio Commission, the National Association of Broadcasters, and the American Association of Advertising Agencies.

Hon. EWIN L. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I have very much enjoyed Senator DILL'S address, as I am sure all of you have, and there is really no occasion for any other representative from Congress to discuss this question. He has covered it so fully and so ably and so entertainingly and I have prepared absolutely nothing whatever to say to you, not even in my own mind. I was scarcely able to be with you at all, because of official duties.

I am not going to make a speech, but I do wish to supplement what Senator DILL has said in a rather informal talk.

I am in accord with what Senator DILL has said, and I believe that that represents pretty well the congressional viewpoint. We are the legal custodians of the law regulating radio. Because of the situation, with which all of you are familiar, it was necessary for some functionary, some tribunal, to regulate radio; for reasons which were apparent to all that service could be rendered solely by the National Government, and the Federal Government having necessarily and properly assumed jurisdiction over the subject there goes with that authority a certain responsibility and obligation.

The Federal Government is the trustee for all the people in providing for the allotment to different citizens of the right to use the air through the instrumentality of the radio. It is assumed that the air belongs to all the people, that no one individual has any vested rights therein, and that radio consequently is a matter of public interest. Consequently radio should be regulated and administered in the interest of and for the benefit of the entire public, including all classes of citizens.

Those of us in Congress feel, therefore, that it is our duty to approach this subject from that standpoint. The interest of others is only incidental, so far as the interest of the whole public is concerned.

As I understand I am expected, as was Senator DILL, to talk with you with particular reference to radio advertising. I certainly would not be capable of talking to a convention of expert and experienced advertisers upon any other feature of their work, even if it were true (which it probably is not) that I am capable of discussing this one phase of your profession and problems.

In the first place I wish to state that, with Senator DILL, I am a believer in the American system. In fact, I think it is always better for functions of any kind, unless they be strictly governmental, to be administered by private citizens rather than through the Government. I think that that applies to radio. However, I am very decidedly of the opinion that the use of it should be and must be regulated in the public interest. And, of course, as we have a system now which is largely predicated upon advertising, or rather funds raised from advertising, the question of advertising enters very definitely and importantly into the subject.

I always undertake to talk very frankly, either publicly or privately. I may be too candid sometimes, but that is my method, and I never mean anything offensive by it. I shall probably say some things that many of you do not approve. However, I want to state that whatever I may say will be said in an entirely kindly and friendly spirit. I am in no sense hostile to advertisers or advertising in the proper place and of the proper kind. However, I state without hesitation that I think we have decidedly too much sales talk over the radio, and I think that that is the general public opinion, and I think that that is proving harmful not only to the radio industry, to the broadcasting stations, but to the advertisers themselves.

Senator DILL enumerated certain powerful factors who are making a crusade against so much advertising over the radio. I have in mind a much larger, a much more important, and, to my mind, in the final analysis, a much more influential group than those which he mentioned. I refer to the rank and file of the listeners.

Having been for 12 or 13 years a member of the committee of the House which has jurisdiction over radio legislation, I have given the subject much consideration and as much investigation as I could. At all times, wherever I have been, I have been on the alert to learn what I could with respect to the public psychology as related to radio. Consequently, for years and years I have, to the best of my ability, been studying the public viewpoint, and I am sure that Senator DILL and I have somewhat more opportunity to get a general expression and a general knowledge upon that subject from various sources than is true with respect to the ordinary individual because of our connection with the subject of radio legislation. We receive letters constantly from everywhere giving the views of the listeners and of various other citizens upon the subject.

In addition to that, people talk with us frequently and constantly about the subject, and I know my colleagues who come from every section of the United States talk to me about the matter. They give their own reactions and they give the reactions of their constituents, which they receive through personal contact and through correspondence.

In the light of that study and of information coming through those various sources, I am convinced that there is a very considerable dissatisfaction with and reaction against the amount of sales talk now going on over the radio. And when that situation is being agitated and that feeling is being fanned by the aggressive elements which Senator Dill has mentioned, in my opinion it will reach such momentum that something will be done with the present system.

I want us to retain this system we have, but I want us to curb and to reform this system, not only in order that we will be able to retain it but in order that it may render the public service which radio can and should render.

My friends, radio is not maintained to sell goods. There is no justification for the Federal Government maintaining an agency for the purpose of advertisers to use in a commercial way. The only justification for advertising, for the commercial use of radio, is the use of it in such a way and to such an extent that it may be maintained financially for the purpose of rendering a greater and a larger public service.

Those are my views. And I want to state furthermore that I do not believe the public will stand for any other use of it in the final analysis.

With respect to the amount of sales talk that is being indulged in, more than two years ago I began giving public warnings along this line, before there was any pronounced public reaction. I talked with many of those engaged in the broadcasting industry. I have discussed it with them since. Many of them have all along said, "I think you are correct. I agree with you, but we will handle the situation ourselves."

However, instead of that situation, which is causing criticism, being remedied it has grown steadily worse. There is more advertising talk over the radio to-day, according to my observations, than there ever has been before.

Of course, you gentlemen naturally feel that I am not capable of giving you advice with respect to advertising, but, based upon my own observations and the things that I hear said around me constantly, as indicated before, I think that much of the advertising going over the radio now is overdone to such an extent that it has the opposite effect from that sought by the advertisers.

The purpose of advertising is to win good will for this, that, or the other commodity or service. When it does that, it is successful advertising. When it creates ill will it has the opposite effect, and it is very common to be in any group when a radio program is coming over the air and to hear expressions of disgust on all sides, on the part of the audience. In a case of that kind that advertising is doing the advertiser more harm than it is good and it is certainly doing that broadcast station or that chain system a great deal more harm than it is good.

Not only that, but when you indulge in so much of that advertising talk interspersed all through a program you are going to lose listeners, more and more.

I will tell you what my idea is: That you will get very much better results by having a moderate amount of advertising than you will by having the amount that is generally given now. For instance, this is what ordinarily happens: If there is a name advertised or if they mention some commodity, in a very brief statement, and then they go into the program the auditors will listen to all of it. But when they know from experience that when this announcer or this advertiser starts to talk he is going to talk for a minute or 2 or 3 or 4 minutes, what happens? Do those listening sit there and listen through that talk? No. They start talking with each other; they either go to biffing this sales talk or they start talking about something else. So the advertiser loses the effect of even having them listen to what is being said. Then if the program goes on for a few minutes and then they go back to that advertising talk, the same thing occurs.

If you give the public only so much sales talk or so much advertising, they are willing to listen and absorb and you will be doing infinitely better for yourselves than you will if you make it so lengthy or so obnoxious that they will not listen to it at all and will turn away in disgust either mentally or physically. In other words, I am firmly convinced that a proper curb on advertising will not only be in the interest of radio generally but even in the interest of the advertisers themselves.

I don't know what experience you have had, but my observation has been such that I have become absolutely convinced beyond any peradventure of a doubt of the sentiment which I am expressing.

Another thing. As I suggested before, the Federal Government is trustee of this important function, of this function with such a tremendous potentiality. The public so regards us. They come to us with complaints if they think that we are not administering our trusteeship in a manner in which they think it should be administered. And as I stated before, the obligation does rest upon us to see that radio, which we have assumed to supervise and to regulate, shall be held on a high and an unobjectionable plane from every standpoint, in so far as that may be possible.

Right in that connection, the House of Representatives has passed, and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the Senate has reported, I believe, a bill which embraces a provision forbidding the conducting or advertising of lotteries or lottery contests over the radio. There has been very little objection even from the industry to that so far as I have heard, but we couldn't do otherwise. Certainly Congress and the Federal Government can not be put in the attitude of licensing citizens to violate the laws of every State in the Union over the radio.

I heard mention of these contests to-day. They arouse interest, yes. You can always arouse interest with a lottery. Why, the Federal Government could go into the lottery business and could conduct a great national lottery and raise enough money to run the Federal Government without any other taxes. Yes; that could be done. But we can't afford to do it. We can't afford to raise public revenue in that way. In like manner we can not afford to license individuals to do the same thing.

If we regulate and maintain radiobroadcasting upon a sane, sound basis and in a manner that it will render a service that is acceptable to the masses of the people, there won't be any difficulty about continuing the present American system, at least in principle. If we fail, however, to maintain it on that plane, you may rest assured that there will be such a reaction that the system will inevitably be changed.

I do not want to see that done, and so I give the warnings which I have to-day and heretofore, with a view to preserving the system and avoiding the destruction of it. But, as I say, I am convinced that there is room for reform, there is room for correction of evils.

I have discussed this subject—and they have come and discussed with me—with many men engaged in broadcasting and in other branches of the radio industry, including executives of broadcast stations and of broadcast systems. Almost without exception they agree that I am correct in principle. They approve all of it but they speak of difficulties. They say that "the advertising agencies insist upon more sales talk than we ourselves think is proper. We have trouble with them constantly."

I understand that the advertising agencies say they have trouble because of the insistence of their clients.

I don't know just how that is. I expect that is true. I suppose that the average individual advertiser is obsessed with the idea that if he is to pay for 15 minutes he should be able to talk just as much as they will let him about himself and his goods. But he is looking at it from an individual selfish standpoint. He is not looking at it from the interest of that broadcast station and he is not looking at it from the interest of the broadcast system generally. So perhaps the advertising agency feels that he may want too much advertising and maybe he will politely curb him just as much as possible but still agree to perhaps more than he himself thinks is wise. The same thing takes place between the advertising agency and the broadcast station.

There is an opportunity and a duty for everybody involved, but I will frankly say that I haven't a great deal of faith that it is possible for the industry itself to entirely eradicate an excessive amount of sales talk. Even if a majority of advertisers and a majority of the advertising agencies and a majority of the broadcast stations and systems were aware of the situation which I have undertaken to describe and were disposed to prevent an excessive amount of talk, there would certainly always be a considerable element who would persist in an excessive amount of sales talk.

And so one advertiser will go to one station—one agency—and he will be allowed to talk this much. One of his competitors will go through another channel and he will not be permitted to engage in so much talk. The latter naturally wants to have as much sales talk as his competitor, and so he will go to his station and say, "If you don't permit me to talk that much I shall have to go to the other station," and so he will go. That is the way those things work out.

I have very, very often been impressed with the fact that those in this industry, both the executives of broadcast stations and advertisers themselves, especially those in advertising agencies, realize that this is carried too far and yet they are in somewhat of a vise. They are driven more or less by competitive conditions and forced frequently to agree to something which they themselves do not approve. Consequently I would frankly state, as I have heretofore, that I believe the only reform—and reform is absolutely necessary to preserve the system—will be some regulation by Congress itself, or rather some criterion laid down for the Radio Commission, so as to treat everybody alike, so that everybody will be on the same basis. In my opinion that would not only not result in hurting radio or the advertiser but it would really help both.

Therefore I do not consider that any suggestions I make in this regard are hostile to either. Of course, if permitted to run on in an unbridled way, it is doubtless true that for the time being more revenue might be received. But I am talking about the future. I am discussing what will result in the final analysis and we may as well look at that because we are going to be confronted with it, and not at any distant date, unless there is a change in the present system. I mean not so much the present system as the present practices.

I have thought over this matter a great deal. I have discussed the question of the method of regulation with a great many people in all branches of the radio industry as well as those who are not within the industry but who are interested in the subject and in the success of radio broadcasting, and I think that it is pretty generally recognized by all of those with whom I have discussed the subject that the practices can not go on to the extent they are going on now, with respect to excessive advertising. I should like for us to correct this situation before it reaches a point that the public will not be satisfied with the correction but will want to use the guillotine instead of the pruning knife.

We have so often seen a lack of recognition of a sentiment and a disregard of sentiment, until it finally got absolutely beyond bounds, and I am convinced that we are confronted with such a situation with respect to radio advertising.

I don't expect all of you gentlemen to concur in these views and conclusions. But as you were kind enough to ask me to come and talk with you I felt that you wanted my real, candid views and did not want or expect me to come down here simply for the purpose of attempting to entertain you. So I have in this very informal way given you very briefly and incoherently some of the thoughts which I have upon the subject, and I believe that that expresses the sentiment of a very large segment of the public, not to speak of the interests who, perhaps, may have a different motive, and which, as I said, were described by Senator DILL.

Instead of killing the goose that lays the golden egg let us all work together toward perfecting instead of destroying a great American system of radio control. I thank you. [Applause.]

Chairman GAMBLE. We thank you, Mr. DAVIS, for this very interesting talk.

Both Senator DILL and Representative DAVIS have expressed their willingness to answer questions. I hope that our members and guests will take full advantage of this unique opportunity for a personal exchange of views.

Mr. GANNON (New York): Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the judge if he would state the type of regulation which he favors.

Chairman GAMBLE. Mr. Gannon has asked Judge DAVIS to state the type of regulation which he favors.

Representative DAVIS. Well, of course, that has been a moot question among those who feel that something should be done along this line, and various suggestions have been made.

My opinion candidly is that it should consist at least chiefly of name or indirect advertising and perhaps the use of a slogan. I agree thoroughly with you gentlemen who have stressed the difference between the quality of advertising. Some of it is objectionable, no matter how brief. Others are not so unless carried to an unusual length. But there is no way of defining or regulating the character and efficiency of an announcer or of a particular program. While there is undoubtedly a difference in the quality and in the acceptability of it from a listener's standpoint, yet notwithstanding that, I think that many of the programs are entirely too lengthy as far as advertising talk is concerned.

I think many of you gentlemen are aware of the fact that some of the most effective advertising in the history of advertising has been name advertising. I think entirely too much stress is laid upon purely elementary descriptions. For instance, if you are advertising a certain car, it isn't necessary to tell the public what a car is for or details which are familiar to everybody who is interested in a car. What you should do is get over to the public mind that particular car.

It is the same with regard to tooth paste. Anybody who is likely to buy tooth paste knows what it is for when he buys it. It isn't necessary to give a long detailed instruction as to how to use it.

So it is with various things. I think that by name advertising at appropriate intervals, and not too often, and perhaps by the use of some slogan which would drive home the commodity or the service, some brief statement of that kind, you will get more results than you will by a continued detailed discussion of a fundamental use of the commodity because you will hold the attention of the listener during the entire program and the entire statement; whereas, as I said, and I have observed it so often and have heard others say that they have observed, if you go into a long sales talk they will quit listening and begin thinking about something else or talking about something else.

That is my view in a general way.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the judge a question?

Judge DAVIS seemed to be rather positive about the large number of people who object to the type of advertising credit that is now being employed. I should like to ask the judge if he has made any investigation—let me make this statement first: He has likewise evidenced a desire that we continue to give to the American people the kind of radio entertainment that they are getting at present. I should like to ask the judge if he has made any investigation as to what would happen to radio if the advertiser should be reduced to mention of name only and a slogan. Does he know or does he have any idea as to what use would be made of radio under those circumstances?

Representative DAVIS. It was used largely in that manner up until recent years, until the last two or three years. It started with name advertising. Advertising got in. It has gradually grown and grown and grown. It is my opinion that the advertiser would get just as good or better results and would continue to advertise as much as he does now.

That is my opinion.

Chairman GAMBLE. This closing session of the fifteenth annual meeting of the four A's has certainly been one of the most interesting in it. For its success we are deeply indebted to our distinguished guest speakers of this afternoon. We thank them.

MIRRORS OF WASHINGTON

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered from Washington by the Secretary of Agriculture, Arthur M. Hyde, over a chain of stations of the National Broadcasting Co. on Wednesday evening, April 20, 1932.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered from Washington by Secretary of Agriculture Arthur M. Hyde over a chain of stations of the National Broadcasting Co., Wednesday evening, April 20, 1932:

O wad some power the giftie gie us
To see oursels as ithers see us!
It wad frae monie a blunder free us
An' foolish notion.

Ever since Bobbie Burns penned those lines it has been considered good medicine to see ourselves as others see us. It is usually bitter stuff, but most medicines are beneficial in direct ratio to their bitterness. Mere introspection is valuable but usually biased. Looking into a mirror held by the other fellow is free from any favorable bias and reduces bumptiousness. All of which leads to the observation that most of us in Washington have been looking with mingled pain and profit into mirrors held before us by a lot of people. In this the Department of Agriculture is no exception.

Sometimes, however, we suspect that the mirror is twisted. For example: Not long ago a distinguished Senator, his appetite keen for economy in all States except his own, leaped greedily upon the efforts of the Department of Agriculture to eradicate white-pine blister rust, a disease which threatens to destroy $420,000,000 worth of white-pine timber, and to eradicate which the department is spending about one-tenth of 1 per cent of that amount annually.

The Senator was attempting to explain what white-pine blister rust is. He said: "White-pine blister rust is a little insect that first forms on the bark of the white-pine tree as a little worm, develops into a moth or fly, and then flies to a currant bush."

Here the Senator became somewhat muddy, but he seemed to feel, rather than think, that this determined moth next lays eggs on the currant bush, the eggs become worms, then change to flies or moths (I wish he'd make up his mind which), and at once dart back to the white-pine trees to do their deadly work. "The bud of the currant bushes," said the Senator, "or the sap of the currant seems to strengthen their boring qualities, and they bore through the pine a little bit."

I showed this esoteric bit of natural history to a scientist in the Department of Agriculture. He was aghast at the extent and novelty of the Senator's revelations in the field of biology. After he had recovered sufficiently, he told me the Senator's statement was accurate except for such minor details as these: White-pine blister rust is not a bug, moth, or fly, it is a fungus disease. It does not pick, peck, poke, or bore holes into the pine tree, but acts on a tree just like a germ disease does on a man. As much as we all admire the Senator and his uncanny ability to confuse insects with diseases, bushes with trees, and facts with fancies, we in the department suspect that the mirror he has held up to us is cracked.

Another "hot one," which originated on the floor of the Senate and has spread from New York to the Golden Gate, is that merry gibe at the Department of Agriculture about a bulletin alleged to be entitled "The Love Life of a Bullfrog." It was such a "rip rarin'" good one that it is a pity to spoil it. The cold facts, however, are:

1. No bulletin of that name was ever issued by any governmental department.

2. No bulletin dealing with frogs, their lives, legs, or loves, has ever been published by the Department of Agriculture.

In spite of the fact that the original gag isn't true, there is nevertheless a "good one" in the yarn which I must let you in on.

1. The gag was originated by Democrats to show how silly the Republicans are.

2. The only basis for it is a bulletin entitled "Frogs," which was published in 1919 by the then Democratic administration of the Department of Commerce.

3. The Democrats not only paid the expense of printing and circulating the bulletin, but they paid a Cornell professor $1,700 for writing the manuscript.

All of which shows once more the desirability of examining the mirror before you ask the other fellow to look into it.

Another mirror into which we in the Department of Agriculture are continually gazing is a chart which, with an ominous and altitudinous curve shows that the expenditures of the department have jumped from $30,000,000 in 1917 to $300,000,000 in 1931. No explanation accompanies the chart. Consequently, two conclusions are immediately drawn. One: That in 14 years the low-browed bureau chiefs of the department have expanded their baleful activities by ten. Two: That from the work of these bureaucrats no benefits whatever have resulted. One genial editor, in a recent speech, charged us with being racketeers. This criticism would have been passed over as mild and reasonable except for the fact that the editor resides in Chicago and spoke with that authority.

I enter no defense for governmental extravagance. Projects which take money may be highly desirable in prosperity, and highly undersirable at other times. Consequently, I connived with the President to lop off from the appropriations for the Agricultural Department all that could be lopped off and still carry on the duties with which we are charged under the law. Congress can take more because by so doing they will relieve us of our obligations under the law. They have our blessing. They can take more if they choose. There will be no yelp from me. Our duties are whatever Congress makes them, and be our appropriations little or still less, we of the department will click our heels and carry on with whatever is left.

But before the department, its chief officers, or myself are held up to the country as having expanded our operations ten times, let us analyze that chart a little: One hundred and seventy-four million dollars of that $296,000,000 spent in 1931 went for Federal highways, none in 1918; $50,000,000 went to farmers in the form of drought-relief loans; $14,000,000 went direct to the several States for experiment stations, extension services, and forest-fire prevention.

These three items aggregate $238,000,000 of the $296,000,000 charged to us in 1931. The funds were not appropriated because heavy-jawed bureau chiefs demanded them. The States wanted roads and crop-production loans and experiment stations, and Congress provided the money. We were merely the channel through which the money flowed from the Federal Treasury to the States.

Thus it is clear that only one dollar out of five appropriated to the Department of Agriculture goes for our own expenditures—and of this dollar nearly 60 cents goes for public-health services and conservation. The remaining 40 cents may be said to be purely agricultural.

Consequently when the mirror of increasing expenditures is held before the Department of Agriculture, we see not so much the work of bureaucracy as the demands of the States and of the people.

These statements are made not to minimize the need for economy nor to belittle any effort to cut down governmental expenditures but to point out some of the difficulties in the way of achieving those desirable ends. Beyond a doubt there exists in the vast and complicated machinery of government some of that sinister scheming and reaching for larger powers which is covered by the general term "bureaucracy." Nevertheless it is not bureaucracy which has built the machine and added millions to our tax burdens. The real culprit is the demand which has come from the people to relieve local burdens, from organizations of class or special interests to obtain special benefits from the Federal Treasury. To this demand Congress, which derives its mandates and its votes from the people, has lent an all-too-willing ear until we have built up a set of needs and a machine against which Congress is itself powerless. Local self-government has avoided its responsibilities and abdicated its powers. We have built our own Frankenstein.

Not the least of our difficulties is the fact that, by yielding to local and special demands, we have built up an ever-growing appetite for larger demands. I know of no better example of this than the so-called crop-production loans which the Department of Agriculture is making to farmers.

The genesis of crop loans lies in the action of President Wilson when, in answer to an emergency war need, he loaned small amounts in the Northwestern States to buy wheat for seed only. This action, proper as it was, immediately became a precedent which has been expanded in peace time far beyond its original intent.

The purposes of such loans have been expanded to include not only seed but feed for work animals, fertilizer, oil and gasoline for tractors, and repair of irrigation ditches. In 1931 the purposes were further expanded to include drought relief, feed for livestock, agricultural rehabilitation in all respects affecting crops—and in 1932 to include loans wherever farmers are otherwise unable to obtain loans for crop purposes.

In my own three years at this post I have seen the amounts expand from $6,000,000 in 1930 to $67,000,000 in 1931 and $200,000,000 in 1932.

A few weeks ago I protested against such loans and the enormous expansion in their purpose and amount. Immediately I found myself in the headlines.

One Senator charged me with being unsympathetic to farmers. I hope I am not lacking in sympathy with the American farmer. He is my client. His success is my job.

In opposing such loans I am not thinking of the burden such huge sums cast upon the taxpayers of this country (among them the farmer himself), but I am thinking of the welfare of the American farm family.

I assert that you can't save American agriculture by injecting it full of the opiate of credit. You may stimulate it temporarily. You may later lull it to sleep, but it will wake up next fall with all the painful reactions of surplus production and low prices. It will be burdened with an accumulated debt which will require years to pay off.

Seed loans may be justifiable and desirable when a visitation of nature, such as a storm, flood, or drought, has devastated whole counties or States and bears unequally as between individuals or groups of farmers. But when the exigency is economic and affects every one of us alike, the experience inherited by the farmer from his pioneer ancestors teaches him that the man who lives on what he has and borrows least will come through best.

The vice of Government loans is manifold. The Government can not make discriminations between the needs and the merits of individual citizens. We must loan not only to the worthy and the industries, but to the unworthy and the shiftless, provided only they come within the scant limitations of a general act of Congress. Such loans defy the inexorable economic law. They perpetuate in the competitive picture submarginal farmers and submarginal farms to the detriment of those who, but for the competition thus created, might succeed. They delay recovery.

When the money is going out, all is well. But when the attempt is made to collect it back, pandemonium breaks loose. Local interests want to collect the proceeds of the crop themselves. Political interests wheel into action demanding cancellation of the debt or a moratorium, or at least an extension of time. To the everlasting credit of the farmer be it said that he does very little of the howling. Also be it said that his own views are so much sounder than those of his representatives that during the very time that his representatives were dinning it into our ears that he could not pay, the farmer went ahead and paid over 60 per cent of our 1931 loans.

The farmer needs many things much more than he needs loans. He needs relief from the excessive burden of taxation which he bears. He knows that, because he is a consumer, much of the burden of taxes which is ostensibly loaded upon industry comes back to him in the price of what he buys.

He needs a consuming population which possesses a high buying power, not a population burdened with taxation.

The primary need of the farmer is not loans but a market, where he can sell his products at a fair price. To obtain this market, he needs an organization which will represent him. To obtain such an organization, the Government can help and is helping through the Farm Board. To hold such a market, he needs the protection of a tariff high enough to give him undisputed possession of the home demand. To reap full benefits of such a market, he needs to control his production to such volume as will balance with demand. Governmental funds will be more wisely employed in relieving the domestic market from the burden of existing surpluses than in stimulating by means of loans a larger production and an increased surplus.

The statement is frequently made that the President's program for recovery provides ample assistance for banks, railroads, and corporations, but none for "the little fellow." Such statements are utterly unfounded. It is true that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation makes its loans to such institutions, but its primary purpose is to release the strangle hold which fear and panic have had upon the credit and the job of "the little fellow."

The extent to which our difficulties are due to unreasoning fear and panic is hard to measure. Some indication may be had from the fact that although our foreign trade has declined (in dollars, not volume) less than 5 per cent of our productive capacity, our production has declined somewhere around 30 per cent. Yet the consumptive power of our people is just as large as it was at the heyday of consumption. Some part of the difference between 5 per cent and 30 per cent of our productive capacity is pure scare.

The distress of "the little fellow" during these last 30 months has been due to that scare. Fear and panic have been prolific causes of credit contraction. Bank failures and the shrinkage of railroad values have been the fuel upon which the flames of panic fed. The daily announcement of bank failures, in the days gone by, alarmed not only other depositors but other bankers. Each new failure tied up, not only the deposits of the failed bank, but forced other bankers to protect themselves against possible runs by demanding payment of loans, and by refusing to extend new credits. Thus by the spread of fear, credit was withdrawn from business. Consumption declined, and production was reduced. In turn, railroad tonnage fell off, and the value of their securities dropped. This added to the difficulties of the banks in which "the little fellow" had his savings and the insurance companies in which he carried his risks. Bank failures, contracting credit, falling buying power, declining production—it was along this vicious circle as it spiraled downward that "the little fellow" lost his market and his job.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation was given the job of reversing this process. Already the failure of banks has largely ceased, and this cause for alarm has been withdrawn. If the flow of credit to business is resumed, "the little fellow" will regain on the way up what he lost on the way down.

Those who criticize because loans are made to banks and other institutions should pause to remember, first, that all such institutions are required to put up adequate security and pay 5½ to 6 per cent interest, and, second, that we are living, not in a state of nature but in an organized society in which such institutions render a vital service to every one of us. To illustrate: You can get in Africa land as fertile as any to be had in this country. You can get all you want of it. It will cost you little or nothing. But you wouldn't have it even as a gift. You wouldn't have it because it has no banks, no railroads, none of the service corporations and institutions which are necessary to a civilized standard of living in an organized society. If we permit our banks to fail, credit will dry up and business will stop. If we permit our railroads to fail, farms will also fail. This is so perfectly obvious that even slight reflection will demonstrate the President's program to be primarily for "the little fellow" and an answer to his needs.

It was on this very point that a prominent Democratic candidate for President recently said:

"I will fight any candidate who persists in any demagogic appeal to the masses of the working people of this country to destroy themselves by setting class against class and rich against poor."

I am not in the habit of taking marching orders from Democratic sources, but here at last is a point upon which I line up with Al Smith.

While we are gazing into mirrors held up for us to look into, let us all look into a great mirror and see ourselves as a Nation. It will reflect back to us our own image, in the cold light in which we view the other fellow. Let us each ask ourselves what sacrifice we are making for the welfare of the Nation. We were heroes in war. We vied with each other in the glorious sacrifice and we won! What about peace-time sacrifices?

Congress can not do it all. Congress is your creature. It represents you. We shall solve many of our problems when Senators stop talking about "my State" and begin talking about "my country"; when Representatives forget their district and remember only the Nation. And that happy hour will occur when organizations massed behind special interests are willing to submerge those interests for the national welfare, when sectional interests are merged into the larger interests of the whole Nation, and individuals with pet projects are willing to offer them on the altar of national well-being. For, after all, Congress represents us as we are. Members of Congress are just as patriotic, just as wise, and just as courageous as we will let them be. The beginnings of wisdom, of patriotism, and of courage lie in each one of us—as individuals. That, after all, is the mirror which reflects a true picture.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, seldom is the House of Representatives honored by the presence of a distinguished lady guest. On yesterday women assembled in Washington from all the States of the Union elected a new leader. I refer to that organization of patriotic and public-spirited ladies known as the Daughters of the American Revolution. These ladies chose as their president general for the coming three years an esteemed constituent and personal friend of mine, Mrs. Russell William Magna, of Holyoke, Mass. She was accorded the unusual honor of being elected without opposition in recognition of her years of faithful and outstanding service to the organization.

It is a privilege and pleasure to present to the Members of this House the president general elect of the Daughters of the American Revolution, Mrs. Russell William Magna, who, with her husband and father, is now in the Speaker's gallery.

I suggest that the House extend to her a hearty welcome. [Applause.]

FEDERAL PAY CUTS

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, a petition protesting against Federal pay cuts, a mile and a quarter in length, signed by 24,000 taxpayers of Milwaukee, was to-day presented to Senators LA FOLLETTE and BLAINE and members of the Wisconsin delegation in the House by representatives of postal employees' organizations. The petition was addressed to me as chairman of the House Post Office Committee, who turned it over to the Wisconsin legislators, including the Hon. JOHN C. SCHAFER and Hon. GEORGE J. SCHNEIDER on the east steps of the Capitol.

The petition is the result of an educational campaign carried on by the "Big Three" organizations of postal employees—the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, the National Association of Letter Carriers, and the Railway Mail Association. These groups, representing directly 150,000 postal employees, are acquainting business men with the fact that a Federal pay cut means a diminished purchasing power reacting against the restoration of prosperity in every community in the country.

The officials of the postal organizations making the presentation were: Leo E. George, Thomas F. Flaherty, and William Otte, of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks; Edward J. Gainor, M. T. Finnan, and Clarence Stinson, of the National Association of Letter Carriers; and William Collins, Henry Strickland, and J. F. Bennett, of the Railway Mail Association.

NAVY DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11452) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11452, the Navy Department appropriation bill, with Mr. FULLER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, before the Clerk begins the reading of the bill I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. I rather think most of the members will be interested in this statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, we carry on pages 25 and 44 of this bill provisions limiting flying pay to $1,100 per annum. By reason of such action we have subtracted $6,187 from the appropriation for the Naval Reserve, $271,890 from the appropriation for pay of the Navy and $16,130 from the appropriation for pay of the Marine Corps, or a total of $294,207.

I am advised that on yesterday the Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics of the Navy Department informed the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. BYRNS] that if the committee would remove the limitations on the amount of flying pay that might be paid to an individual officer, that the department would so administer the assignment of officers to flying duty as to make the reduced appropriation for pay of the Navy suffice. This would be accomplished, I understand, by refusing flight orders to officers whose duties do not make it essential for them to engage in aerial flights.

The committee is willing to accept that proposition as a substitute, and I shall move, when the paragraphs containing the limitations have been read, to strike them out, and to insert in the appropriations pay of the Navy and pay of the Marine Corps limitations on the total amount that may be expended for flight pay in conformity with the suggestion of Admiral Moffett. [Applause.]

The small amount—$6,187—deducted from the appropriation for the Naval Reserve I shall move to restore.

In conclusion, I wish to read a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to Chairman BYRNS, dated April 21, 1932, relative to this matter.

THE SECRETARY OF THE NAVY,
Washington, April 21, 1932.

MY DEAR MR. BYRNS: Referring to the provision on page 25 of the naval appropriation bill, which limits so-called flight pay to $1,100, may I urge that, in view of the grave uncertainty whether aviators will continue their voluntary acceptance of flight duty at this limit of pay, that you support the amendment striking out lines 11 to 15 on page 25 and lines 10 to 12 on page 44. If this is done, the Navy feels that it can accept the reduction of flight pay elsewhere provided.

Very truly yours,

C. F. ADAMS.

Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYRES. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. May I ask the gentleman whether the same will apply to the submarine service?

Mr. AYRES. Yes. We will make the same provision, of course, as to the submarine service.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. If there is no joker in it, this looks good, and I will study it.

Mr. AYRES. I assure the gentleman he has my permission.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYRES. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then, I understand the position of the committee is that they will not recommend to the Congress a reduction in the base pay for flying service?

Mr. AYRES. That is right.

Mr. STAFFORD. I say that in view of the fact that the Committee on Military Affairs held a hearing this morning at which the head of the Army flying service and others gave testimony showing the injustices which would follow if the limitation as carried in the Navy appropriation act was also carried in the Army appropriation act. So it is now the purpose of the Appropriations Committee to abandon that policy with reference to base pay?

Mr. AYRES. That is right. Of course, the gentleman means flying pay.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. Will that apply to both services?

Mr. AYRES. I can not speak for the Army.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will that apply to the Army as well as to the Navy?

Mr. AYRES. As I said to the gentleman from Wisconsin, I can not speak as to the Army.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYRES. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. In view of what has just transpired I would like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee if he had any member of the Navy Department before his subcommittee personally to justify the bill that is now before the House, not the one as amended but the bill as it is now before the House, as affecting aviation and submarine pay decreases.

Mr. AYRES. Admiral Moffett filed a statement, which appears in the hearings.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is not answering my question. Did any member of the Navy Department come before the gentleman's subcommittee and testify?

Mr. AYRES. No; not as to reducing flying pay.

Mr. BRITTEN. That is the reason the bill is as it is.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVAL RESERVE

For expenses of organizing, administering, and recruiting the Naval Reserve and Naval Militia; pay and allowances of officers and enlisted men of the Naval Reserve when employed on authorized training duty; mileage for officers while traveling under orders to and from training duty; transportation of enlisted men to and from training duty, and subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; subsistence of enlisted men during the actual period of training duty; subsistence of officers and enlisted men of the Fleet Naval Reserve while performing authorized training or other duty without pay; pay, mileage, and allowances of officers of the Naval Reserve and pay, allowances, and subsistence of enlisted men of the Naval Reserve when ordered to active duty in connection with the instruction, training, and drilling of the Naval Reserve; pay of officers and enlisted men of the Fleet Naval Reserve for the performance of not to exceed 48 drills per annum or other equivalent instruction or duty, or appropriate duties, and administrative duties, exclusive, however, of pay, allowances, or other expenses on account of members of any class of the Naval Reserve incident to their being given flight training unless, as a condition precedent, they shall have been found by such agency as the Secretary of the Navy may designate physically and psychologically qualified to serve as pilots of naval aircraft, $3,071,499, of which amount not more than $150,000 shall be available for maintenance and rental of armories, including pay of necessary janitors, and for wharfage; not more than $81,000 shall be available for employees assigned to Group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the schedule of wages for civil employees in the field service of the Navy Department; not less than $575,079 shall be available, in addition to other appropriations, for aviation material, equipment, fuel, and rental of hangars, and not more than $336,375 shall be available, in addition to other appropriations, for fuel and the transportation thereof, and for all other expenses in connection with the maintenance, operation, repair, and upkeep of vessels assigned for training the Naval Reserve: Provided, That no appropriation contained in this act shall be available to pay more than one officer of the Naval Reserve and one officer of the Marine Corps Reserve above the grade of lieutenant or captain, respectively, for the performance of active duty other than the performance of drills or other equivalent instruction or duty and/or the performance of 15 days' active training duty.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve a point of order on the proviso beginning in line 23, page 12, and extending to line 6 on page 13.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's point of order comes too late. An amendment has been offered and is in the hands of the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. AYRES: Page 12, line 8, strike out "$3,071,499" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,077,686."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYRES. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand, the effect of the proposed amendment is to take care of the aviation-pay matter that the gentleman just referred to.

Mr. AYRES. That is it exactly.

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not make provision for taking care of the Great Lakes boats that have in the past been in the service and which are desired by many to be continued in the service for 1933.

Mr. AYRES. No; it is confined entirely to the restoration of $6,187 for flying pay for reserve aviators.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition to the amendment.

I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY], because he may lose his rights if this amendment is adopted, whether he intends to offer any amendment to increase the appropriation as carried in this item?

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I may inform the gentleman from Wisconsin that my amendment is waiting on the desk, and I understood I could offer the amendment after action was taken on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES].

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire what the amendment is? If we adopt the committee amendment, I will say to the gentleman, there will be no further amendment with respect to the total amount, and I do not want the gentleman from Michigan, or the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. PITTENGER], or anyone else to lose his rights. I am trying to act in a protective capacity here.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman will suspend a moment, the Chair is informed that if the gentleman from Michigan cares to offer his amendment, he should offer it to the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, and should offer it now.

Mr. PITTENGER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas a question.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have the floor. For information, Mr. Chairman, may we have the proposed amendment read?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CLANCY as an amendment to the committee amendment offered by Mr. AYRES: On page 12, line 8, strike out "$3,071,499" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,171,499."

Mr. STAFFORD. I now yield the floor to allow the gentleman to offer his amendment.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CLANCY as an amendment to the committee amendment offered by Mr. AYRES: On page 12, line 8, strike out "$3,071,499" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,171,499."

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of my three amendments is to make an appropriation of $100,000 for the operation and maintenance on training cruises of five training ships and two Eagle boats.

These ships are stationed at strategic points on the Great Lakes at Chicago, Duluth, Detroit, Cleveland, and Toledo and provide for the yearly training of 2,960 officers and men who would help to operate in time of war the additional war ships and transports which would be put into the service to defend the country.

The committee has cut out over $600,000 as the cost of training naval reservists on training ships on fresh and salt water.

My amendments merely aim to restore $100,000 of this $600,000 plus and to add specific language to make sure that the Great Lakes training is included in the program for the navigation season of the year 1932. A number of great States with a population of about thirty millions of people is covered by this item.

These States are New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Minnesota.

SPRUNG AS A SURPRISE

The members of the appropriations subcommittee have repeatedly admitted that the Navy Department did not take them into its confidence in its alleged plan to junk and sell these five ships and two Eagle boats on the Great Lakes. The chairman, Mr. AYRES, said yesterday that the first belated notice came through an item in the Army and Navy Journal. Mr. TABER, of New York, of the committee, also said on the floor yesterday the same thing, and that notice came after his committee hearings were closed.

Earlier this week Members of the House—for instance, Mr. WHITE, of Ohio, and Mr. PITTENGER, of Minnesota—said they had been informed by the Navy Department that the purpose is to sell and junk the ships which have cost millions of dollars for what can be practically gotten for them as old iron. Members of the subcommittee insist the ships will not be junked.

These ships are not obsolete with possibly one exception. They have been modernized and are safe and can provide for the yearly training of 3,000 men. Two of the ships just last year cost $150,000 in improvements and were changed from coal burning to modern, economical, oil-burning ships.

Certainly we ought to clear up the confusion which exists in the minds of the Members of the subcommittee and of the House as to just what the Navy Department intends to do with these ships. Some say on the floor of the House they will not be junked and others say just as positively on the floor they will be junked.

GREAT LAKES TRAINING BEST

The Navy Department claims that salt-water training is better than Great Lakes training for the naval reservists, who will be expected to operate ships in time of war both in navigating the ship and in running the engine room. Admiral Simms, the United States Navy chief at Chicago, and the naval reservists say just as positively that the Great Lakes training is much superior to the open-ocean training because of the difficulties of navigating the river and lakes of the Great Lakes and of the presence of a tremendous amount of traffic day and night.

A LOSS AND NOT A SAVING

The Navy Department say they will save $36,000 per year by junking these ships and taking the 3,000 naval reservists of the Great Lakes region to salt water by railroad and maintaining them there.

The officers of the United States Naval Reserve Association say just as positively that these figures are false, and that instead of saving $36,000 they will lose much more than that amount by the greater cost of transportation, and so forth.

My amendments do not aim to restore the summer cruises. Mr. TABER, of the subcommittee, who has made a deep study of the question, says he is not in favor of the summer cruises this year, but that he does believe in the week-end cruises. My amendments provide for the week-end cruises this year and next summer.

PASSING THE BUCK

Chairman AYRES says that the Navy Department is recommending this action, and that they are the experts and we should take their word for it; but the Navy Department has made mistakes before and will make them again, and is making them now.

We can not pass the buck to the Navy Department. The responsibility is ours. We can not alibi ourselves by saying that we took the recommendations of the bureau chiefs.

Some say we can not afford this $100,000 for national defense. I hold in my hand a newspaper photograph of the Dubuque, a fine serviceable gunboat with oil-burning engines, covering the Detroit district. Last year it cost only $27,000 to operate. It can carry about 250 men on a cruise and afford them training. This summer and next summer it can be operated much cheaper than $27,000.

THE DEADLY PARALLEL

The Appropriations Committee say we can not afford fifteen or twenty thousand dollars for that boat, but the Appropriations Committee say that we can afford about $3,000,000 per year on the Detroit front for a fleet of rum chasers and patrolmen.

I hold in my hand large newspaper photographs of a part of the rum-chasing fleet on the Detroit front which went into commission a few days ago, on April 16. Here they are, 50 of them, expensive motor boats, most of them practically new. See the tremendous wake they make as they tear across the water, some of them going 60 miles an hour and eating up every hour tremendous amounts of taxes in gasoline. This is only a part of the fleet. There are many Eagle boats and Coast Guard cruisers much larger than these motor boats. These border patrolmen and their boats cost at least $3,000,000 per year on that front, and yet you say you can not afford fifteen or twenty thousand dollars to save the Dubuque?

MILLIONS FOR PROHIBITION

There are about 150 customs border patrolmen on the Detroit front. There are about 230 Coast Guard men on the Detroit front, which extends to Buffalo, and their orders allow them to mobilize on the Detroit River for an emergency. There are also about 230 immigration border patrolmen on the Detroit front, thus making about 600 Federal border patrolmen who are superimposed upon about 3,500 policemen, deputy sheriffs, marshals, State police, and so forth, who are supported by city, county, and State taxes.

You might say that they are necessary to watch the 3,500 other policemen, but the customs border patrolmen on the Detroit front have been the most corrupt force in the history of American police work.

The United States Commissioner of Customs a few years ago, testifying before high Canadian officials at Ottowa, Canada, said that 90 per cent of them were dishonest or inefficient.

Every year tremendous scandals develop and a number of these customs officials are sent to Leavenworth or Atlanta by United States courts. They have shot innocent men and they have terrorized men, women, and children.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLANCY. Now, you say that you can afford millions per year for men of this sort and you can not afford $100,000 for the Naval Reserves, who are the very highest type of American manhood according to all the testimony—sober, honest, patriotic, and intelligent.

Every high Government official in charge of the border patrol testifying recently before House and Senate committees said that the Canadian embargo on liquor is efficient and that very little of it is coming across the Canadian border, probably 1 per cent of all the liquor used in the United States; and yet you are willing to throw away millions of dollars on this parasitic service and also to destroy an arm of the national defense, the Naval Reservist boats of the Great Lakes.

I regret to have to bring in the question of prohibition enforcement, but the very same House Appropriations Committee which seems to take a vague stand on the destruction of these five training ships and two Eagle boats on the Great Lakes is the very body of men who say that it is necessary to waste all this money on these prohibition-enforcement speed boats, Eagle boats, and cruisers.

Why, if you would just eliminate the cost of five of these motor boats and the salary of the men necessary to run them for one year, you could run the Dubuque easily for two summers.

You have a number of prohibition-enforcement torpedo-boat destroyers on salt water, some of them with crews of 80 or 90 men; and if you just laid up one of those prohibition cruisers for one year, you could run the entire training fleet on the Great Lakes for at least a few years.

If you tied to the dock one cruiser of the regular Navy, you would not have to curtail this Naval Reserve training in any respect, summer cruises and all.

You say you can not afford the $100,000 for all these ships. That statement is extremely inaccurate, to say the least.

BREAKING FAITH WITH DETROIT

I have in my hand resolutions passed by the Common Council of Detroit, April 19, 1932, protesting vigorously against the Navy Department breaking faith and the implied contract existing between Detroit and the Federal Government which was made when the city of Detroit gave about a million dollars' worth of property to aid in this naval training.

BREAKING CONTRACT WITH STATES

I hold in my hand a similar resolution passed by the house of the State legislature at Lansing, also protesting against the Navy Department for its proposed scheme to abolish naval training on the Great Lakes and the junking of these ships, breaking faith and the implied contract with the State of Michigan which was made when the legislature was induced to appropriate $600,000 recently to aid this Federal naval training.

What is true of Michigan is true of Illinois, which gave $800,000 for this naval-training work, and Ohio, which gave $200,000, and New York, which gave $500,000.

The Navy Department breaks its word of honor and its implied contract, alleging that it can save $36,000 per year, whereas the United States Naval Reserve Officers' Association, a body of honest, patriotic, intelligent men, claims that a great loss to the taxpayers will result.

The Government claims it can not take care of these reservists who are mostly not on salary and who give up their time and energies as an arm of the national defense, and yet it can put on these waters a couple of hundred Customs and Coast Guard border patrolmen, prohibition-enforcement agents, to watch over 3,500 policemen who are paid out of the city, county, and State coffers.

Every year a large number of these Detroit border patrolmen are sent to Leavenworth or to Atlanta to "the big house," and it is estimated that it takes only three months to corrupt a new force. Are you going to say to the taxpayers that you can pay $3,000,000 every year for a border patrol and a worthless fleet of boats like this, 50 fast speed boats eating up gasoline, parasitic, and doing no good, but that you can not afford $15,000 or $20,000 per year to maintain this historic gunboat, the Dubuque, which is doing a great deal for the national defense?

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLANCY. Yes.

Mr. SWEENEY. Will the gentleman explain to the House the amounts of money the several States have contributed voluntarily toward this matter?

Mr. CLANCY. Yes. Michigan gave $600,000. Illinois, thinking the United States Government would keep its implied contract, gave $800,000. Ohio gave $200,000, and New York gave $500,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. Thirty million people are affected directly in six or seven States, and several gentlemen from these States wish to discuss the matter.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. I have an amendment that will strike out the proviso at the bottom of page 12 and that may require some considerable time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. AYRES) there were—ayes 43, noes 55.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making a statement to the House. It is perfectly satisfactory, of course, to have unnecessary debate if the House wants to, but I serve notice on the House now that we will have a Saturday session unless this bill is completed to-day. If the House wants to stay here to-morrow, we will be glad, of course, to discuss these matters at length, or as long as you want to, but the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] made the motion simply for the purpose of expediting the passage of the bill. He had no other purpose save the view and the hope that it would be possible to conclude it to-day and take a recess over to-morrow until Monday.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Tennessee can stop debate much more quickly than under 30 minutes on this amendment if they will ask that the rules be enforced. In other words, let us have five minutes debate on each side of each of these amendments.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to enforce the rules if the House wants to stay here, but I want gentlemen to understand that if we continue this debate we will meet to-morrow to complete the bill.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, we do not want to consume unnecessary time; but if the gentleman will ask for a show of hands as to the number of members here who want to talk, I think he will find there may be only five or six, and then we can go ahead, but we fear the gentleman is not going to give opportunity to discuss the question.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not want any gentleman on the floor of the House to think that personally I would cut off anybody. I simply want gentlemen to understand the facts and to understand the necessity of completing the bill to-day or of meeting to-morrow to complete it. I shall be here anyway.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

There is no desire, Mr. Chairman, to prolong debate unnecessarily, but this is an important proposition to the Members coming from the Great Lakes districts. The amendment proposes to increase the appropriation, as recommended, $100,000. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] has already offered to increase the appropriation $6,000 for a fad aviation service. We are only seeking an appropriation of $94,000 for an essential service, which is as essential to the fleet reserve as the camp maneuvers are to the National Guard during the summer encampments.

It is now proposed by the department that, instead of having these Naval Reservists, who are the same as National Guard men, trained for two weeks on vessels on the Great Lakes, where the States have contributed hundreds of thousands of dollars for the maintenance of that service, that service should be discontinued after September of this year, and instead the Naval Reservists should be transported thousands of miles to the seaboard for that character of training.

It has been the aim and endeavor of the War Department Appropriations Committee to have similar exercises, as far as the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and the citizen's military training camp service are concerned, carried on proximate to the places where the men are organized for the sole purpose of saving transportation expense. Now, seamen can not be developed by being trained on land. We must have vessels; and it is just as essential to have a vessel on the Lakes where they can have week-end training as well as the two weeks' training as it is for an infantryman to have a musket in order to be properly trained.

The restrictive proposal is being carried altogether too far. There is only $100,000 involved. I hope the gentleman from Kansas, in his magnanimous spirit, will agree to the $100,000 in order to keep these vessels on the Great Lakes. The gentleman knows I have tried to cooperate in every endeavor for economy, but it is my firm opinion, after reading the hearings, that here is a place where we can really economize by allowing $100,000 for the maintenance of these vessels. Will the gentleman from Kansas not accede to that reasonable request?

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. AYRES. I would say to the gentleman the committee did not initiate this. The responsible officials of the Navy Department came before our committee and stated that as a measure of economy this step had been taken. Now, we do not wish to be placed in the position of asking the Government of the United States to spend money which the department itself is trying to save.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, it is not always that the Secretary of the Navy, who hails from the classic atmosphere of Cambridge, knows what the conditions are on the unsalted seas of the Middle West. He might know something about Boston, but he does not know of the practices that are indulged in on the Great Lakes. He has not qualified in that particular. In this bill, on yesterday, we carried $100,000 or more for training marines at schools supported by four States along the seaboard. We are only wanting what is fair. We want to educate the Secretary of the Navy in order to broaden him in his knowledge. He has too much classical atmosphere about him.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman propose that the Secretary of the Navy shall serve an apprenticeship on one of these training ships?

Mr. STAFFORD. It would have been far better if he had gone West to get some knowledge of the liberal thought and ideals that prevail in the West, especially as to maritime conditions on Lake Michigan and Lake Erie and Lake Superior.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the motion which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] proposes to discuss?

Mr. SHREVE. I propose to discuss training schools and ships on the Great Lakes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman rise in opposition to something pending before the committee?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes. I am in favor of the amendment that is now before the committee to add $100,000.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, I have lived on the shores, within a short distance of the shores of Lake Erie, all my life, and I think I know something about the proposition.

One hundred and thirteen years ago the world's fleet was built right in Erie harbor. Erie is my home city. The first battleship that was ever built on any waters was the old Michigan that was built on Lake Erie. For more than a hundred years that great body of water has been recognized by the Navy in Washington as one of the finest and best places to train men for service on the seas. Why? Because, as one of the gentlemen who has preceded me has already stated, there are the dangers of navigation. John Sharp Williams, on the floor of this House, once said that more freight passed through the harbor of Detroit and down the Lakes than passed out of New York, London, Hong Kong, China, and Buenos Aires. When vessels seven and eight hundred feet long, carrying 12,000 tons of freight, are placed on that inland sea, there is an opportunity to test the navigating abilities of the men who are trying to run a ship, a great deal better than if they are sent out on the ocean to float around in the sunshine, and not have any of that experience that they get in navigating the Great Lakes.

I am amazed when I hear there is a thought of doing away with those ships and that they are going to be scrapped. In the old days men who received their training on the Great Lakes would never have thought of such a thing.

The old Michigan spent its winters in our harbor. Its officers and men married our girls, and for a long time the city of Erie was known as the mother-in-law of the Navy. Those old-time commanders would not have thought of destroying the training ships on the Great Lakes. They would have been in favor of building more ships, because they knew exactly what it meant. They knew that men trained on the Great Lakes were far superior to those who received their training on the ocean.

I hope this motion will prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit another unanimous-consent request, that all debate on this section and amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I want to take just a minute to support the motion of my colleague [Mr. CLANCY]. We are all in favor of economy and the reduction of expenditures by the Government to the lowest point possible consistent with the welfare of the people. The only difference of opinion arises over what activities shall be curtailed and to what extent the expenditures for any given services shall be reduced.

The naval unit of my home city, Grand Rapids, Mich., Division 13 of the United States Naval Reserve Forces, has ranked first in the report of the Naval Reserves Inspection Board for the last several years. The members of the organization there have taken great pride in their work and are very enthusiastic about it. It would be exceedingly unfortunate to do anything here that would dampen or discourage that enthusiasm. The failure to pass the amendment offered by my colleague will not only deprive them of training of great benefit to them and to the Government but it would at the same time go a long way to destroy their morale. What is true of the Grand Rapids unit is equally true of other units around the Great Lakes. For one, I trust the motion of my colleague will prevail.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, 15 years ago we went to war in a condition which permitted us to train men while we stood behind the defenses of our allied armies. While those with whom we were fighting were protecting us we attempted to train both officers and men.

Here is an organization, the Naval Reserve, that is used not only for men who were trained then but men of education who want to be trained now in order that they might help us if such an emergency should arise in the future. As to the probability of that emergency I shall not speak, but I will say that speeches were made on the floor of this House less than two months before the World War started to the effect that there was no chance of war and that there were no signs of war. Speeches were made on the floor less than two months before we went into the World War to the effect that we could not possibly get into it. So you can not take for granted any such eventualities, because you can not see them coming.

I want to say to you that in my opinion this is an effort to destroy the entire reserve force of both the Marine Corps and the Navy for the purpose of preserving the money for the regular Navy forces. [Applause.] It is not economy in any sense to attempt to destroy ships which two years ago were remodeled. Besides the two ships my colleague from Michgin [Mr. CLANCY] mentioned, a ship in my own home city was overhauled in 1930 at an approximate cost of $40,000. To scrap that ship at this time would be a rank and inexcusable extravagance.

I insist to you that the building of this reserve force has made a valuable and useful arm of the defensive service of this country.

I want to call your attention to some figures in connection with the Marine Reserve, which we are not discussing now but will come to later. In 1928 and 1929 it cost $459 per member of the organization trained. In 1930 and 1931 it cost $62. These men in the Naval Reserve are willing to go on the same basis of no pay and no money for uniforms. Those whom I have been able to reach have expressed a willingness to even provide their own mess if these ships are preserved for them.

These men have been willing to cut down the force in charge of this ship to one officer and three enlisted men as ship keepers for half of the year, or during the summer months, and five during the winter. This cost for one ship will be about $30,000. These men are willing to go on this basis.

To scrap these ships will be a rank destruction of something that we spent money on two years ago, and will not be a saving in any sense of the word.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. Can the gentleman see any justification for Members of Congress who are trying to reduce expenses to vote $100,000 into this bill when the Navy Department says it does not want it and does not need it?

Mr. WHITE. The Navy Department is attempting to destroy this part of the civilian service.

Mr. BYRNS. What right has the gentleman to make such a serious charge against the Navy Department?

Mr. WHITE. I insist it is true.

Mr. BYRNS. Here is an order issued by the Navy Department discontinuing training up there after September 1, and yet the gentleman proposes that we vote $100,000 of the taxpayers' money when the department says it does not need it.

Mr. WHITE. I still maintain that my charge is true. Why not sink a battleship to save money? That would do it. That is the same principle exactly.

Mr. PITTENGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. PITTENGER. Is it not a fact that when the hearings were held before the subcommittee on naval expenditures no such program was presented, and is it not the fact that after the hearings were printed, after the committee had ceased its deliberations, without a single objection or without any support of the Naval Reserves, the Navy Department then issued this order to junk or decommission these vessels, and is it not a further fact that the economy that is being practiced, if there is any, is at the expense of the Naval Reserve Force and not at the expense of the other branches of the Navy?

Mr. WHITE. Exactly; and I thank the gentleman for his suggestion.

Mr. WOODRUFF, Mr. FRENCH, and Mr. AYRES rose.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, 8 minutes of the 20 minutes for discussion on this paragraph has been used by those in favor of the amendment. I shall certainly insist on only 2 minutes more being used for that purpose and that those in opposition have 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's position is well taken, and the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] for two minutes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, under the circumstances, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. BYRNS] asked the gentleman who just preceded me what justification there is for asking an additional $100,000 for the purpose of keeping these ships in commission, these Naval Reserve officers, and men on the Great Lakes, if we are to put into effect the economy program we are all so anxious to see adopted.

We have 3,000 officers and men in the Naval Reserve on the Great Lakes. Since time began for us a part of our naval force has been trained on these waters. Conditions for training naval personnel there are ideal. I wonder if you gentlemen know that it is the policy of the Navy Department, if this legislation goes through, to in the future train these naval reserves on the Atlantic Ocean. This is the program, and I wonder if you gentlemen know just how much it will cost to transport these 3,000 men to the Atlantic coast and back again each year. It will cost just $50,000 more than the amount involved in the amendment.

If we are trying to reduce the expenses of government, if we are trying to do something for the sake of economy, here is an opportunity to practice it and at the same time show the people of the States bordering on the Great Lakes that Congress appreciates the substantial appropriations made each year by those States to assist in the training of this naval personnel.

It is not a matter of importance to me, Mr. Chairman, whether or not the Naval Reserve is trained in one place or another. It is important, however, that this training be given where it will be most effectively done for the least expense. An examination of all the facts will convince anyone that transferring these activities to the Atlantic will add to rather than reduce the cost, and this without adding in any way to the efficiency of the corps. As a matter of fact, it is believed by the officers of the corps that the training on the lakes is, because of its peculiar effectiveness, vastly superior to that given with the fleet on either the Atlantic or Pacific.

I believe the first thing in connection with this or any other question that should be considered by Congress is the welfare of the country. Everyone knows, who knows anything about our past wars, that our regular Navy and our Regular Army are the first lines of defense. Our Naval Reserve and the National Guard are next called upon. It is upon the foundation formed by these arms of the service that the entire war strength of the Nation must be built. The peace-time strength of neither the Army nor the Navy is such as even to properly police the country, man our coast defenses and strategic points on the one hand, or to properly man our available fighting ships on the other.

On the call to arms it is the reserves in both services that are first called to the colors. They must be fit for any duty. They must be ready to meet any demand made upon them. They must be able to take their places alongside their fellows of the Regular Establishments without loss of time for further training. This they can not do unless they are given something more than a bare 15 days' training per year. They will have this, as they have in the past, if these ships are kept in commission and these men are permitted to continue to train as they have trained in years gone by.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] has told you something of the splendid traditions of these civilian sailors of the Great Lakes. They are of a nature to inspire every member of the corps all down the years to come. The spirit of enthusiasm for the service should not be killed. The adoption of the amendment will preserve it.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment, and in order that others may have time I shall try to limit my remarks to two or three minutes.

One of the gentlemen, a moment ago, said that the Members of the Congress are in favor of retrenchment and reduction in national expenditures except, he said, in the matter of allocation. The trouble is we are in favor of reduction when it touches the other fellow, but opposed to it when it touches an area or a community in which we are interested.

The gentleman who has just spoken referred to the cruises and to the trips that would be made to the sea and the extra expense over the method that has been followed in the past and that which would be followed if the cruises were made upon the Great Lakes. The trouble with this argument is that it is not involved in the pending amendment, because the Secretary has already determined the course for the coming fiscal year. There will be no cruises either upon the Great Lakes or with the ships of the Navy at sea.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Not now.

The problem, then, is whether or not we are going to put this additional money into the bill for the purpose of retaining these ships for the coming year.

I may say there is carried in the bill now something like $52,000, which will be adequate to care for these ships until the first of the coming year. In the meantime, all the evidence touching upon the problem that the gentleman from Michigan who preceded me suggested, and any other factors may be considered by the committees of the Congress and by the department, and that will be ample time for us to consider whether or not we shall withdraw these four craft from the naval establishment or whether we shall continue the program that has been followed during the last some years.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman has mentioned the remarks I made and has commented upon them.

Mr. FRENCH. I am sorry, but I must yield the floor to members of the committee on the other side.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, in the limited time I have I would like to call the attention of the House to the amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk, which strikes out the proviso beginning on line 23, page 12, and running over to page 13. This proviso will take out the reserve service—it does not cost any money—and it will conform to the desire of the Navy Department. This language, if it stays in the bill, will take out of the reserve force such officers as Commodore Forscheu, of New York; Capt. Edwin Evers, the most efficient officer in the reserve force; and many other men who have given the best part of their lives to this fine service. They are qualified for any duty in any emergency, and will build up the personnel of the regular Navy when called upon to do so.

My amendment will not cost an additional dollar. It is only in line with the desire of the Navy Department for greater efficiency in the reserve force. I hope you gentlemen will lend me your assistance and give to the Navy what it wants. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this proviso as worded, when taken in connection with basic law, would seem to deny all officers above the grade of lieutenant from receiving pay other than for 15 days' training duty. Basic law (sec. 21 of the act of February 28, 1925, to provide for the creation, and so forth, of a naval reserve and Marine Corps Reserve) provides that officers above the grade of lieutenant shall not be entitled to pay for the performance of drills or equivalent instruction or duty, but they shall receive pay for the performance of appropriate duties. Since the savings for the appropriate duty pay of officers above the grade of lieutenant, as contained in the Budget, were not deleted from the appropriation, and no mention of this feature was contained in the committee report, it is believed that it was not the intention of the committee to deprive all Naval Reserve officers above the grade of lieutenant from receiving their appropriate duty pay.

Of the reserve officers above the grade of lieutenant now on active duty, there are many who have been performing their duties long and efficiently. Under the proviso objected to, they would have to be replaced with new and untried personnel. The principle of discharging old and faithful servants of long service and their replacement with new personnel at the slightly lower rates of pay for the sake of the comparatively small savings involved, is considered to be unjust and not conducive to the highest efficiency. Through certain changes which have recently taken place, there are certain positions or offices held by reservists which can be vacated entirely. Through the savings effected in this way, sufficient money is now contained in the bill to permit the retention of the various officers of the higher grades which the bureau desires, without any increase in appropriation. The retention of these officers can not, however, be effected within the terms of the proviso.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, answering very briefly the argument of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], I will state that it will cost more than $30,000 if you strike out this proviso. The gentleman is in error when he says it will not cost a dollar.

Now, inasmuch as he predicated his whole argument on the statement that it would not cost more, I think that a sufficient answer, since his amendment was evidently offered because of misinformation.

In reference to the other matter, discussed at great length and with much feeling, no member of the subcommittee would detract in the slightest degree from the fine and well-deserved tribute paid to the reserves in the States bordering on the Great Lakes. They are efficient, loyal, and serve with a splendid spirit. We are treating them like other reserves, and have followed the advice of the Navy Department in doing so.

The amendment as offered, carrying an additional $100,000, does not require that the President and the Secretary of the Navy must spend it. It is left to their discretion.

Let me read to you the order:

For economical reasons, all 15-day training cruises now scheduled for Fleet Naval Reserve division, all districts, will not be made this summer and instructions pertaining thereto are canceled.

All 15-day training cruises and all 15-day training duties are eliminated for entire fiscal year '33. Above eliminations do not apply aviation divisions.

Week-end cruises authorized as heretofore.

The appropriation carried in the bill as reported carries sufficient funds to provide for cruises through September.

It likewise provides funds for the care of the ships up to January, and if when we re-assemble in December the ideas of the Navy Department should change, we can provide funds for the rest of the year, if it is then thought wise to do so.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Not just now. The Navy Department has full knowledge of these matters. They recognize the fine service that these reservists are rendering, but they are trying to cooperate with Congress in its effort to reduce expenses. They have frankly said, "Here is where we believe without hurt to the service we can effect a saving," and that is why the committee has recommended this to the House. The Navy Department has said in advance, "Do not give us this because, forsooth, we might not spend it if you did give us the money. We feel that we are prompted by the same desire and the same purpose as Congress is manifesting in keeping down appropriations." Under the circumstances would the House have expected the committee to pay no attention to what the Navy Department recommends, and which largely reduces this appropriation?

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Is there anything to the statement that these vessels are to be junked?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. There is nothing, so far as the committee knows. These vessels are provided for until January and an officer is assigned to the district to that date, and this appropriation that we have recommended carries every dollar necessary to carry on the cruises to the end of September, and likewise provides for the care of ships to January.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlemen from Alabama has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan as an amendment to the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CLANCY) there were—ayes 68, noes 73.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. CLANCY and Mr. AYRES to act as tellers.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 105, noes 110.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 22, after the word "vessels," insert a comma and the following: "including the training vessels and Eagle boats on the Great Lakes."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that that is an amendment to the amendment. The question is on the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. AYRES) there were—ayes 127, noes none.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I now offer my amendment as an amendment to the end of the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 22, after the word "vessels," insert a comma and add the following: "including training vessels and Eagle boats on the Great Lakes."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CLANCY) there were—ayes 52, noes 70.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. CLANCY and Mr. AYRES to act as tellers.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 100.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRITTEN: Page 12, line 23, strike out all of the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BRITTEN) there were—ayes 39, noes 89.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. PITTENGER: Page 13, add the following at the end of line 6: "Provided, That the Navy Department shall not put into effect its plans, revised or otherwise, to withdraw and decommission the training vessels and Eagle boats on the Great Lakes now being used for the Naval Reserve."

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I think that this is a limitation. It limits the expenditures that might be made to junk these ships.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Kansas to the fact that, in line 18, on page 12, the word "rental" is misspelled.

Without objection, the Clerk will correct the spelling.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVAL RESERVE OFFICERS' TRAINING CORPS

For the procurement, maintenance, and issue, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, to institutions at which one or more units of the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps are established, of such means of transportation, books, supplies, tentage, equipment, and uniforms as he may deem necessary, and all other miscellaneous items, including cleaning and laundering of uniforms and clothing at camps or on board ship; and to pay commutation in lieu of uniforms at a rate to be fixed annually by the Secretary of the Navy; for transporting supplies and equipment from place of issue to the several institutions, training camps, and ships, and return of same to place of issue when necessary; for the establishment and maintenance of camps of instruction, and schools on ships for the further practical instruction of members of the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and for transporting members of such corps to and from camps, ships, or other designated places of instruction, and to subsist them while traveling to and from such camps or ships and while remaining therein so far as appropriations will permit or, in lieu of transporting them to and from such camps or ships and subsisting them while en route, to pay them travel allowance at the rate of 5 cents per mile for the distance by the shortest usually traveled route from the places from which they are authorized to proceed to the camp or ship and for the return journey thereto, and to pay the return travel pay in advance of the actual performance of the travel; for pay of students attending advanced camps or advanced schools on ships at the rate prescribed for enlisted men of the seventh pay grade; for the payment of commutation of subsistence to members of the senior division of the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps, at a rate not exceeding the cost of the commuted ration of the Navy; for medical and hospital treatment, subsistence until furnished transportation, and transportation when fit for travel to their homes of members of the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps injured in line of duty while at camps of instruction or on ships; and for the cost of preparation and transportation to their homes and burial expenses of the remains of the members of the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps who die while attending camps of instruction or on ships; and for the cost of maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, $90,085: Provided, That none of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used for any expense incident to training or practice cruises of members of the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps, but members of such corps denied such cruises in consequence hereof shall not be refused appointments as ensigns in the Naval Reserve by reason thereof: Provided further, That uniforms and other equipment or material issued to the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps in accordance with law may be furnished from surplus or reserve stocks of the Navy without payment from this appropriation, except for actual expenses incurred in the manufacture or issue: Provided further, That in no case shall the amount paid from this appropriation for uniforms, equipment, or material furnished to the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps from stocks under the control of the Navy be in excess of the price current at the time the issue is made.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BRITTEN: Page 15, line 1, strike out all the language after the word "Provided," down to and including line 6, and insert the following: "Any member of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps denied the advance-course training cruise at the convenience of the Government shall not be refused appointment as ensign in the Naval Reserve by reason thereof."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, of course, if my amendment is subject to a point of order, then this proviso is subject to a point of order, because I have accepted half of the proviso as presented in the bill. The part I have stricken from the bill will be approved by the Navy Department, so that the reserve force shall not be completely crippled, and at the same time without increasing the appropriations for the Naval Reserve.

I hope the chairman of the committee will be fair with the House. I do not use that expression in any offensive way at all. The language which is carried in the amendment which I have offered is language that is in the bill which the gentleman has proposed; and if the language in the amendment is subject to a point of order, then the language in the gentleman's bill is also subject to a point of order. I am merely aiming to perfect this legislation. I am sure the gentlemen will agree with me. There is $90,085 carried for training, food, subsistence, maintenance, and all sorts of expense in connection with the Naval Reserve. That is shown on page 15—$90,085. The language that I ask to be taken out of the proviso is this:

That none of the funds appropriated in this act shall be used for any expense incident to training or practice cruises of members of the Naval Reserve.

Now, realizing that $90,000 is carried in the bill, much of that $90,000 in the past would go for mileage, for food, for pay, and various other things connected with the reserve training. Now, it is barely possible that if my amendment is carried and the amount—$90,000—is left as it is, the department may still carry on its cruises. The cruises are the backbone of the reserve force. They may still carry on their summer cruises and make arrangements with the reservists to pay their own mileage, to pay for their own food, to accept, if need be, a reduction in pay.

In any event we will get the younger, the more agile, and the better subjects for the reserve force, who in time of emergency will build up into the officer personnel of the Regular Navy. There is nothing drastic about the amendment. I simply take out the proviso that is in the bill which says that no part of this $90,000 shall be used for training cruises. If we are going to retain the reserve force, let us give them an opportunity to cruise, if they can, on the $90,000 that is carried in the bill. If they can not maintain their cruises, if they can not put their cruises into effect with certain additional economies, then that will be too bad for the service; but at least the House should not limit the appropriation of $90,000 for the reserve force by saying that no part of this money shall be used for training cruises.

I hope the House will go along with me on this. It will be approved by the Navy Department. It is something that the reserve force needs. It is something that will prove for the efficiency of the reserve force. It may give the younger men an opportunity to have cruises in the summer time if they are willing to pay their own food or mileage. Let the Navy Department have a little latitude at least and do not encumber the reserve force with the provision that is in the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The subject of the gentleman's address, as announced a few minutes ago, was "give the Navy what it wants"?

Mr. BRITTEN. I said the Navy Department was in favor of this.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman said, "give the Navy what it wants." That is the gentleman's idea?

Mr. BRITTEN. Oh, yes; certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, in 1917, before we entered the war——

Mr. BRITTEN. The summer cruise is probably the greatest incentive to membership in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps. If discontinued, the morale of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps will undoubtedly suffer. In the past the department has been put to expense on account of the cruise for mileage, food, and pay. The amount of the appropriation has been cut; but without this prohibition against the cruise, the department would still be able to offer a cruise to such students as might wish to take it without such reimbursement of mileage, food, or pay as the state of the appropriation might make desirable. It is believed that under these conditions a large number of the ex-juniors could be given the cruise.

Reserve naval officers can not be given proper training without experience on board ships at sea.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may proceed for two additional minutes.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I had reserved a point of order, and I now make the point of order against the amendment, that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

I do not have the amendment before me, but I looked at it a moment ago. It repeats the last half of what is already in the text of this proviso. It omits the first half of the proviso. I call attention to the well-established rule that where language already in the text of a bill or already in the text of an amendment may have been subject to a point of order, an amendment to such language, which does not involve a new point of order or enlarge the objection involved in a point of order, is in order.

In this case this language is in the proviso:

Members of such corps—

Meaning the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps—denied such cruises—

Meaning cruises such as are mentioned in the foregoing—shall not be refused appointments as ensigns in the Naval Reserve by reason thereof.

For that language the gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which reads as follows:

Any member of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps denied the advanced-course training cruise at the convenience of the Government shall not be refused appointment as ensign in the Naval Reserve by reason thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to address a few remarks to the Chair on the question. I frankly confess it is a matter that is not entirely clear in my own mind; but if the point of order is well taken, it is upon the assumption that in the first instance the committee having incorporated in the bill a provision that is itself legislation upon an appropriation bill and it is sought to strike that out entirely by the amendment proposed, whether or not as an original proposition the point of order would not be in the position of being laid against the original proposition, which in itself confessedly is not authorized by law. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment striking out the entire proviso. If he seeks to strike out the entire proviso and add additional language, the purpose of his motion would be to nullify the entire provision and then the gentleman would have to rely upon the proposition offered by himself, which, I think, is confessedly legislation on an appropriation bill. If the point of order is well taken, I think it must be based upon that assumption; and, in my opinion, unless there are precedents to support the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois in his initial statement, the point of order is clearly well taken.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, may I add this one word? I call attention to the fact that the amendment offered by my colleague from Illinois does not strike out the whole proviso. It strikes out everything after the word "Provided" and inserts language in lieu of the matter so stricken out. So it is an amendment offered in lieu of language in the text.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on the point of order. The only instance where it has been held that an amendment that is subject to a point of order may be added to by another amendment that is subject to a point of order is where the original proposition is offered on the floor as an amendment to the bill. Then if the original proposition which is offered from the floor as an amendment to the bill is in itself subject to a point of order and there is no point of order made against it, then it has been held that a germane amendment can be added to it that would otherwise be subject to a point of order. But this is not an analogous case. This is a provision in the bill and it has passed the point-of-order stage. There was no point of order made against it. This is an attempt to strike it out and put something in the bill which is subject to a point of order, because it is legislation unauthorized on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FULLER). The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair is in a little doubt about this proposition, but he is fortified by the opinion of the Parliamentarian. The first part of this clause is a limitation down to line 4 and the rest of it is clearly legislation, but no objection was made to it because it was legislation.

In a decision rendered by Speaker Cannon, found in section 8504 of Cannon's Precedents, it is stated:

A paragraph changing existing law, being permitted to remain by general consent, may be perfected by germane amendments which do not provide additional legislation.

This was concurred in by Chairman Garrett, of Tennessee. As the Chair stated, he was in a little bit of doubt; but being fortified by those opinions, the Chair overrules the point of order.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BRITTEN) there were—ayes 39, noes 79.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVAL WAR COLLEGE, BUREAU OF NAVIGATION

For maintenance of the Naval War College on Coasters Harbor Island, including care of grounds, $100,000; services of a professor of international law, $2,000; services of civilian lecturers, rendered at the War College, $2,000; care and preservation of the library, including the purchase, binding, and repair of books of reference and periodicals, including subscriptions to newspapers, $5,000; for contingencies of the president of the Naval War College, to be expended in his discretion, not exceeding $1,000; in all, $110,000: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for employees assigned to Group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the Schedule of Wages for Civil Employees in the Field Service of the Navy Department shall not exceed $73,000.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BURDICK: Page 15, line 20, change $100,000 to $168,000; page 16, line 3, change $110,000 to $178,000 and add the following immediately thereafter: Provided, That if the training of recruits is continued at the naval training station at Newport and the said training station is not closed, the sum of $68,000 from this appropriation is hereby made available for the maintenance of the naval training station, Newport, in addition to any other sums appropriated for the maintenance of said station.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, yesterday the committee voted down an amendment to increase the appropriation for the training of recruits at Newport and gave as the reason that the Navy Department was considering closing training there and adding it to the War College. It is absolutely necessary to keep up this station and practically the amount that I have asked to be added to this appropriation for the War College is the lowest amount for which the station can be maintained. It is necessary to keep up the grounds whether training is conducted at the training station or not. The War College is on the same grounds with the same supply of heat and with the same pipes requiring the same amount of work, whether actual training is continued at that point or not.

Therefore, it seems to me if you are going to take the sum of $83,000 from the amount that the Bureau of the Budget recommended for the Newport Naval Training Station, you should at least add the sum of $68,000 to the appropriation for the War College in order that they may carry on, because, as I have said, the heat, light, or other similar work is done by the training station on the island, and all that work practically will have to be done if it is continued solely as a War College.

The amount estimated, therefore, is to keep up the station whether training goes on there or not, and the reason for this amendment, as I have said, is because the grounds, the sea walls, the roads, the walks, the pipe lines and the electrical supply are all necessary to be kept up so long as the War College is situated on this island.

I therefore hope the committee will see that this station, which even the Appropriations Committee acknowledges must be carried on for the benefit of the War College, has a sufficient amount allotted them to keep up the work.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion the point is well taken and sustains the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I want to comment on the suggestion made by our good friend from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN], that we ought to give the Navy everything it wants.

Just before we entered the war in 1917 we had 30 admirals. We have 59 to-day. We have approximately twice as many admirals to-day as we had when we entered the war. When we entered the war in 1917 we had 99 captains in the Navy, and to-day we have 242.

We have in Washington doing land service to-day nearly 500 naval officers. They are in each other's way. I wish you would go down to the Navy Department building and go in every room of that building at 10 o'clock in the morning or at 2.30 o'clock in the afternoon and tell me how many high naval officers you find hard at work there. They will be talking over last night's dance, or reception, or bridge game, or golf, or polo, or horseback riding, or something that is not business.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I yield, always, to the big-navy man, who is naturally "wet."

Mr. BRITTEN. In addition to his remarks about the work of the naval officers in a particular department, will the gentleman tell me how many highly paid men there are in the Prohibition Bureau in this town who are wasting money every day?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I shall answer the gentleman. They are not idle. They are hard at work. They are doing good work. They caught nearly $300,000 worth of liquor the other day. And they are now catching the big moguls.

Mr. BRITTEN. Where did that liquor go? Who got the liquor?

Mr. BLANTON. The Government takes it and confiscates it. They have taken in more property and more money in fines than they have paid out in expenses. That is a paying department of the Government; it is self-supporting. It is the only department of the Government that is paying its own way.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say it is a paying job for the agents.

Mr. BLANTON. I can not yield further.

Since my friend from Illinois and my friend from New York are on the floor I want to take this opportunity to take my hat off to the brave Governor of California who has upheld the honor of the great Commonwealth of California. He has seen fit to consider upholding the law and the courts of California of more importance than yielding to outside influence exerted in behalf of a murderous dynamiter. He believes in looking at the record and evidence of a case and paying some attention to it and not trying cases on outside influence; and when it came to granting a pardon to a man who murderously had taken the lives of 10 innocent men, women, and little children with a bomb, he had the guts and the courage to stand up and uphold the law. Great is the Commonwealth of California, and great is Governor Rolph of that great State. [Applause.]

I have probably made a closer study of and know more about the official trial of Tom Mooney than any other Member in this House. At the time Hon. W. B. Wilson was Secretary of Labor, during the Sixty-sixth Congress, I introduced in the House, on June 20, 1919, a resolution known as H. Res. 128, which was referred to the Committee on Labor, which resolution directed the Secretary of Labor to promptly report to the House of Representatives, first, what connection John B. Densmore, then Director of the United States Employment Service, had with the case of Thomas J. Mooney, convicted in California, stating in detail the activities of said Densmore concerning said case, attaching copies of all reports concerning same made to the Department of Labor by said John B. Densmore, director; and second, what connection in behalf of the Department of Labor, since the punishment of said Thomas J. Mooney was commuted to life imprisonment, has any employee of the Department of Labor had with said case of Thomas J. Mooney; and, third, what requests on the Department of Labor, if any, have been made by a grand jury or a court in California for said John B. Densmore, director, to appear in California to give evidence, and what action concerning same was taken by the Department of Labor.

The Committee on Labor gave me a prompt hearing and favorably reported my said resolution, House Resolution 128, on June 26, 1919, and it was referred to the House Calendar, and the then chairman of the Committee on Labor, Mr. Smith, of Michigan, filed the committee Report No. 75, and on June 27, 1919, my said resolution was duly passed by the House of Representatives.

Pursuant to the requirements of my said resolution, House Resolution 128, Hon. W. B. Wilson, Secretary of Labor, transmitted to the House of Representatives his report on July 22, 1919, which embraced a report of 88 printed pages, made by said John B. Densmore, director, detailing how his paid assistants, paid with the money of the taxpayers of the United States, had burglarized the office of the district attorney, Charles M. Fickert, who had tried and convicted Mooney, and how they had secretly installed a dictaphone in this State official's office. This report was printed by the House of Representatives as House Document No. 157, first session Sixty-sixth Congress, and contains 90 printed pages.

I wish every Member of this Congress would get a copy of this House Document No. 157 and read it. You would then understand how in 1918 evidence was already being manufactured to free Mooney when he had been legally tried before an impartial jury of his peers and lawfully convicted in an orderly way of an heinous and dastardly crime.

In such connection, it should be remembered that it was during the Preparedness Day parade in San Francisco on July 22, 1916, that Thomas J. Mooney perpetrated his bomb outrage, throwing his deadly bomb among innocent people and killing 10 men, women, and little children who suffered horrible deaths, and seriously wounding a large number of others.

This report of Director John B. Densmore is disgusting and revolting to every American who believes in law and order. He had the audacity to report to a Cabinet officer of the United States of America, the Secretary of Labor, that—

His plan was to proceed secretly, with but two or three men, and make no move that would attract attention, either from the prosecution, the defense, or the corporate interests of the city of San Francisco.

Densmore further reported that he—had at this time two trusted assistants in San Francisco, and to them I confided my plan of operations, leaving, however, the execution of the details very largely to their own judgment.

Densmore further reported that his assistants "had not been long at work before they unearthed evidence that convinced them that it was absolutely necessary to the success of the operation to install a dictaphone in the office of the district attorney, Mr. Charles M. Fickert."

And then it was most astounding when Densmore, a high official of the United States, confessed that he was a party to committing deliberate burglary when he reported:

This task was a seemingly impossible one, owing to the fact that Fickert keeps himself barricaded behind double-locked doors on the fourth floor of the Hall of Justice in a private office to which only one other man has the keys.

And then, apparently ashamed of disclosing just how he committed burglary and other crimes, Densmore reported:

The full details as to how this dictaphone was finally installed will probably never be divulged, as no good purpose could be served by a recital of the facts, interesting as they are. Some idea of the difficulties involved will be gained when it is stated that more than two months of careful and clever work were required before the installation was complete and the machine in actual operation.

It took Director Densmore that long to bribe the one other man who had keys to the district attorney's office.

Then I want you to note the minute description of the private office of the district attorney of California, which, through committing heinous crimes, this United States official, Densmore, was able to enter secretly, for Densmore reported:

Fickert's office in the Hall of Justice is a very large room in the southwest corner of the building, on the topmost floor. (See diagram, Exhibit A.) It is lighted by two arched windows, one overlooking Portsmouth Square to the west, the other fronting Merchant Street on the south. The district attorney's desk is in the extreme southwest corner of the room, between the two windows. Besides the desk, the room contains a large oblong table; otherwise there is little furniture. On the floor and table, in picturesque disarray, are countless exhibits alleged to the activities of the I. W. W.'s, the Mooney defendants, and other reputed agitators and dynamiters.

You will note that it was this brave district attorney of the great Commonwealth of California who, in behalf of law and order and of good society, was bending his efforts to disrupt I. W. W.'s and dynamiters, and it was this interfering official of the United States Government who was out there, across the United States from Washington, burglarizing even the Hall of Justice in an attempt to manufacture evidence to free a murderous dynamiter.

Densmore further reported:

For dictaphone purposes the location was by no means an ideal one. Rumbling teams and street cars, tooting automobiles, the shouts of Chinese children playing around the Robert Louis Stevenson fountain in the park opposite—these and other sounds from Kearney Street ascended and mingled with the voices of those conversing within the room. The room itself was about 25 by 30 feet, and when conversations were held in a low voice at some distance from the transmitter the results attained were not always satisfactory.

I want to ask my colleagues here in this House if they have ever before heard of a more revolting and disgusting detail of how criminals worked to manufacture evidence.

Now, listen to this. Densmore further reported:

Considerable experiment was thus required to adjust the delicate microphone to the peculiar and baffling conditions. After trying out various combinations of batteries, resistance coils, amplifying valves, and receivers, and making several novel improvements never before attempted in similar lines of work, a final satisfactory adjustment was at last received.

And I want my colleagues here to read all of the ridiculous matter said Densmore reported—that for days he took over that dictaphone, as contained in his said report—none of any probative force, effect, or value whatever, and yet the Secretary of Labor reported to Congress that our Government paid to Densmore's said assistants the sum of $6,101, and other expenses of $1,043, used in committing crimes.

It was my investigation of these criminal activities of Director John B. Densmore on the Pacific coast that led me to discover that he had wasted and grafted several hundred thousand dollars, and the record will show that when he tried to get $5,000,000 more out of the Treasury I fought and blocked it, and kept him from getting it.

After getting the Densmore report of his crimes committed in San Francisco, I then got the House of Representatives to pass my resolution, House Resolution 225, which required the Secretary of Labor to furnish other facts to Congress, and pursuant thereto Secretary W. B. Wilson, on August 28, 1919, transmitted his report embracing the information sought, and same was printed into House Document No. 209, first session Sixty-sixth Congress, and I want my colleagues to get same and read the astounding facts contained therein.

And while he was Secretary of Labor, at an annual convention of the American Federation of Labor at Atlantic City, Secretary W. B. Wilson and President Gompers sat on the platform with Mrs. Rena Mooney and passed sympathetic resolutions and helped to collect funds to fight for Mooney's pardon.

Since the American Federation of Labor has repudiated anarchy and anarchists and communists, and has broken away from William Z. Foster and Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman and that ilk, I had hoped that they would no longer defend a convicted bomb thrower, who killed and wounded his innocent victims by the score, without the semblance of an excuse except that he wanted to break up and interfere with a Preparedness Day parade.

Yet we find to-day reputable members of organized labor, and sympathizers even here in this Congress, who will still defend Mooney, and fight to have him pardoned, when all they know about his case is that money, Densmores, and other influences have tried to cast clouds upon his trial, and to impeach his conviction.

I have personally discussed the details of the case against Mooney with Hon. Charles M. Fickert, the district attorney in California who tried the case, who was familiar with every detail of the testimony, and who convicted Mooney before a fair and impartial jury, and he convinced me beyond peradventure of a doubt that Mooney was guilty, and was lawfully convicted.

Judge Matt I. Sullivan, former chief justice of the Supreme Court of California, who carefully reviewed Mooney's trial, certified that Mooney had been proven to be a dangerous radical, a coworker of Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman, and had been identified with the bomb planting that killed and injured so many people.

Four distinguished, brave, unbiased, impartial Governors of the great Commonwealth of California have now reviewed the conviction of Thomas J. Mooney, and in spite of every influence that could be brought to bear upon officials have decided that Mooney is guilty of a heinous crime, that he was lawfully tried, and legally convicted.

I did not intend to discuss the Mooney case when I arose. Now, I want to get back to these 59 admirals.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question pertaining to the 59 admirals and directly on that point?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. HARLAN. The gentleman spoke of the great number of naval officers in Washington doing land duty.

Mr. BLANTON. Nearly 500 of them.

Mr. HARLAN. How are we going to maintain a naval establishment suitable for war conditions unless we maintain a corps of officers in some way?

Mr. BLANTON. The question has gone far enough for me to answer it. I shall answer the gentleman.

Mr. HARLAN. I would like to finish the question.

Mr. BLANTON. I will answer the question.

If we could conduct the Naval Establishment in 1917—and we had a pretty good one—with 30 admirals, who, after the commencement of the war, got our men across and helped win the war by stopping the German Kaiser and saving the civilization of the world—if we could do all that then with 30 admirals, why do we now need 59 admirals in peace time? And if in 1917 when we entered war we could do it with 99 captains, why do we now need 252 captains in the United States Navy in peace time?

If we could only cut off of the pay roll of the Government the admirals and other big Navy officers we do not need, and cut off the generals and other big Army officers we do not need, and cut off the chiefs and thousands of other bureau employees we do not need, we could then balance the Budget and get back to normalcy, and our Government and people would be much better off.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I am gratified to say that I can agree to some extent with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] on one proposition, namely, on the tremendous number of these useless admirals and captains that we are providing for.

But I can not agree with him in his defense of these prohibition admirals, generals, snoopers, snipers, and boozers for whom we appropriate, and are appropriating, these large sums of money, notwithstanding that we have had a deficit of nearly $1,500,000,000. However, I am hopeful that some day the gentleman from Texas will realize and admit that his defense of these professional prohibitionists was undeserved.

Nor do I agree with the gentleman from Texas in his commendation of the Governor of the great State of California. I respect the people of California. I am acquainted with many of them, and I find in that great State some of the finest men and women in our country. However, I do regret exceedingly that the Governor of California did not have the courage to do the righteous thing and pardon Mooney, a man who is innocently suffering for the misdeeds of others and a man who, as unbiased investigation disclosed and as Trial Judge Griffin and all of the jurors now admit, although they found him guilty at the time, was convicted on perjured testimony. I feel that if the gentleman from Texas, though he is prejudiced against labor, and especially organized labor, would investigate all of the disclosures in that case, particularly in regard to how Tom Mooney was "framed," I feel that he would be man enough to condemn, instead of commending, not only the governor but all of those responsible for the most glaring injustice ever perpetrated in the name of the law.

At this moment I have come into possession of statements which I feel should satisfy even the gentleman from Texas that Thomas J. Mooney not only should have been pardoned but should not have been convicted. Superior Court Judge Franklin Griffin, who presided at the Mooney trial, has this to say in regard to the decision of the Governor of California in denying Mooney a pardon:

A great disappointment. I firmly believe he is absolutely innocent.

Capt. Duncan Matheson, who directed the police case against Mooney, expresses himself as follows:

California has lost another opportunity to correct a miscarriage of justice.

William V. MacNevin, foreman of the jury that convicted Mooney, states:

I am sorry he was not freed.

I am hopeful that in the near future there will be a governor elected in that great State who shall have the courage to do what the great Gov. John P. Altgeld of my State did when he found that certain men were unjustly convicted of a crime which they never committed—pardon an innocent man.

In the State of California an election will soon be held, and I hope the honest citizens of that State will elect a man who will be courageous enough, strong enough, and just enough to do the righteous thing by Mooney, who has been convicted, as I have said, on perjured evidence and incarcerated unjustly.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SABATH. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman to read the public document that I had printed years ago showing John B. Dinsmore's activities in spending hundreds of thousands of dollars of Government money in manufacturing testimony for Tom Mooney in Los Angeles.

Mr. SABATH. I can not yield further to the gentleman. I have read the evidence that he refers to; and if it was manufactured evidence, it was not in behalf of Mooney but in behalf of the State. This much was admitted by the witnesses who were made to offer the perjured testimony which convicted Mooney, to the everlasting shame to the State of California.

Now, as to the Navy, we read every day and we hear on the floor of this House that we are starving the Navy, and that we are starving the Army. I am the last person who wants to see the Navy or the Army starved. I know we are starving 8,000,000 American citizens who are unable to find employment.

When I entered this House 25 years ago we appropriated $94,000,000 for the Navy. Last year we appropriated $360,101,593, an increase in appropriations of almost 400 per cent in a quarter of a century.

And for the information of the House and for those who continually cry and deplore that we are starving the Nation, I shall take the privilege of inserting in the RECORD the figures showing the great increase that has taken place in the Navy as well as the Army appropriations since the beginning of my incumbency in the House. These are not my figures, but have been prepared for me by the director of the Library of Congress, and are therefore correct:

Fiscal year ended June 30—	Grand total, all appropriations	War Department		Navy Department		Pensions, Interior Department

The above figures should forever silence the professional Navy and Army propagandists and lobbyists that Congress is not fair to the Navy or the Army.

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I am absolutely certain that, if a real survey were taken, we would find that we could easily eliminate not only 10 but 20 per cent of the appropriations for the Army and Navy, and that without affecting or impairing in any way the efficiency of either. And I feel, therefore, that the remarks which have been made that we are starving the Navy are unfair and unjust. [Applause.]

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BURDICK: Page 15, line 20, change "$100,000" to read "$168,000," and on page 16, line 3, change "$110,000" to read "$178,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BURDICK) there were—ayes 16, noes 60.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph, and I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I hope that after this 5-minute speech there will be no more speaking out of order. We want to finish this bill this afternoon, else we shall have to have a session tomorrow.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I shall not feel offended if the gentleman from Kansas objects. He is quite within his rights when he objects to time being used on subjects not related to the bill, and I sympathize with him in his efforts to expedite consideration of the bill. I would not have asked to speak out of order were it not for the unfortunate statement made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] in reference to the Mooney case. I can not permit the record to remain unchallenged as to the conclusions reached by the gentleman from Texas and inserted into the RECORD a few moments ago. No fair-minded man, none with the slightest knowledge of law, can read the record in the Mooney case without becoming indignant and ashamed of such administration of justice.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I decline to yield. Every responsible man who was connected with that trial who has learned since the trial of the perjury committed, of the framed witnesses brought there to testify, has expressed his regret for his action in connection with that trial. The judge himself said it was the dirtiest day's work in his life. Every living juror has signed a statement that had he known that the testimony was perjured and framed he would not have brought in a verdict of guilty. Only recently the Wickersham Committee, which the gentleman from Texas himself praised for the great ability of its members and the great confidence he had in its membership, caused an investigation of that case to be made, and the findings of the trained investigators were so repulsive, so repugnant, it so exposed the indecency of that trial to such an extent, that for some unknown reason or for some mysterious reason the report was suppressed. The Senate committee succeeded in obtaining the report, and if the gentleman from Texas will take the pains he can get that report to the Wickersham Committee.

I am sure that instead of taking the floor and glorifying the continued incarceration of an American citizen who has been proved to be innocent, after reading it he will hang his head in shame at the conduct, surroundings, and perjury of that trial.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman be fair enough to yield to me now?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. On that ground I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is talking about a record that has been fixed up since the trial by somebody else. I have been talking about, and the Governor of California has passed on, the official record of the trial itself, which four distinguished governors of California have held showed a lawful conviction.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman refers to a record that has been fixed up, I say yes, the record in the Mooney case was fixed, was perjured, and stands there as a blot on American justice. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Maintenance: For water rent, heating, and lighting; cemetery, burial expenses, and headstones; general care and improvements of grounds, buildings, walls, and fences; repairs to power-plant equipment, implements, tools, and furniture, and purchase of the same; music in chapel and entertainments for beneficiaries; stationery, books, and periodicals; transportation of indigent and destitute beneficiaries to the Naval Home, and of sick and insane beneficiaries, their attendants and necessary subsistence for both, to and from other Government hospitals; employment of such beneficiaries in and about the Naval Home as may be authorized by the Secretary of the Navy, on the recommendation of the governor; support of beneficiaries and all other contingent expenses, including the maintenance, repair, and operation of two motor-propelled vehicles, and one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle, to be used only for official purposes, $98,475.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I did not intend to speak on this bill, but I am wondering what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] would have defend this Nation in time of another war. He wants to increase the river of unemployment by adding to the great many already unemployed many of the officers and enlisted personnel of our Navy, where active service should be continued in order to maintain an adequate defense. He cited the personnel which we had in the Navy prior to the World War, and I suggest to my friend from Texas that perhaps in a future war, where the very destiny of the Nation and the lives and homes of our people are involved, we might not be fortunate enough to have allies carrying the burden of the war for many months until we were able to train officers to command and lead the legions of American manhood as in the case of the World War.

I suppose if another great catastrophe came upon our Nation and her people that the gentleman from Texas would rely upon the naval experts in the prohibition-enforcement part of the Coast Guard Service, who have been trained in chasing rum runners, bootleggers, and hijackers. I suggest that the gentleman from Texas and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] look into the stupendous increase in the cost of maintaining the Coast Guard by reason of its prohibition-enforcement activities, if they want to make a real study from the economy standpoint. I suppose that the gentleman from Texas, in time of national emergency, would also have the Army-officer personnel recruited from the shotgun experts of the Prohibition Unit, which unit is costing the taxpayers many millions of dollars each year. The gentleman from Texas favors this extraordinary large expense in the name of law enforcement. The Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments recently had hearings, which developed that the Bureau of Investigation, Department of Justice, was charged with the enforcement of a multitude of criminal laws.

This bureau is charged with enforcing the Mann White Slave Act, the national motor vehicle theft act, the national bankruptcy act, the national bank and Federal reserve act, all frauds perpetrated against the Government, antitrust prosecutions, thefts from interstate shipments, all crimes committed on Government reservations and the high seas, bribery and corruption of Government officials, and impersonations. These are some of the major violations. There are many smaller violations. They also apprehend all fugitives from justice, whether they have been convicted by another governmental agency or not. They also perform investigative functions for the State Department and other departments of the Government. They also investigate applications for appointment as Federal judges, United States attorneys, United States marshals, and other important officers.

The total personnel of this bureau is now only 820; the total appropriation for the fiscal year 1932 is only $2,978,520, and there are now over 1,100 cases on record for investigation which have not been assigned.

On the other hand, a total personnel of 12,443 and a total expenditure of $40,043,313.50 from the Federal Treasury is provided for the same fiscal year to enforce the one sacred prohibition law.

The breakdown is as follows:

Bureau of Industrial Alcohol, personnel 1,718; expenditure	$4,814,420.00
Prohibition Bureau, personnel 3,380; expenditure	11,369,500.00
Increase in Coast Guard since that branch of the Government has been charged with prohibition enforcement, personnel 7,345, expenditure	23,859,393.50

From the law-enforcement standpoint, as viewed and expressed by the gentleman from Texas, I believe he thinks it is more important to catch a poor widow selling a glass of home-brew containing 2½ per cent of alcohol, in order to support her children, and send her to jail for five years under the nefarious Jones law than it is to catch a white slaver or a murderer on an Indian reservation, or a public official who robbed the Nation of Teapot Dome—Mr. Fall, a Republican, who conspired with Mr. Doheny, that sterling Democrat.

When you talk about law enforcement, come down to bedrock and do not demagogue and try to fool the American people. I wonder if the Committee on Appropriations, led by the economy expert, the chairman of the committee [Mr. BYRNS], really believes this is the correct Navy appropriation bill. It is unfair for the taxpayers of this Nation and the Members of this House and the other body to be made pawns in a fake economy battle of Tennessee, from "BYRNS to MCKELLAR to BYRNS to MCKELLAR."

After careful consideration of the Interior Department appropriation bill, Mr. BYRNS's committee recommended——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and three Members are present, a quorum.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF ENGINEERING

ENGINEERING

For repairs, preservation, and renewal of machinery, auxiliary machinery, and boilers of naval vessels, yard craft, and ships' boats, distilling and refrigerating apparatus; repairs, preservation, and renewals of electric interior and exterior signal communications and all electrical appliances of whatsoever nature on board naval vessels, except range finders, battle order and range transmitters and indicators, and motors and their controlling apparatus used to operate machinery belonging to other bureaus; searchlights and fire-control equipments for antiaircraft defense at shore stations; maintenance and operation of coast signal service; equipage, supplies, and materials under the cognizance of the bureau required for the maintenance and operation of naval vessels, yard craft, and ships' boats; purchase, installation, repair, and preservation of machinery, tools, and appliances in navy yards and stations, accident prevention, pay of classified field force under the bureau; incidental expenses for naval vessels, navy yards, and stations, inspectors' offices, the engineering experiment station, such as photographing, technical books and periodicals, stationery, and instruments; services, instruments, machines and auxiliaries, apparatus, and supplies, and technical books and periodicals necessary to carry on experimental and research work; maintenance and equipment of buildings and grounds at the engineering experiment station, Annapolis, Md.; payment of part-time or intermittent employment in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of such scientists and technicists as may be contracted for by the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, at a rate of pay not exceeding $20 per diem for any person so employed; in all, $18,030,000, of which $250,000 shall be available exclusively for the procurement and installation of new tools and machinery for shops under the cognizance of the Bureaus of Engineering and Construction and Repair, and $90,000 shall be available exclusively to continue in effect for an additional period of 18 months the license agreement entered into by the Navy Department, May 2, 1931, for the use of certain inventions pertaining to radio control: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for employees assigned to Group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the schedule of wages for civil employees in the field service of the Navy Department shall not exceed $1,850,000.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I rise at this time to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if this bill is perfect as reported by his committee from the standpoint of economy and efficiency? If a distinguished Member of another body makes a motion to strike 10 per cent from the total appropriations recommended by the committee and the Senate agrees to the reduction, will the House be called upon, under suspension of the rules, to cut 10 per cent, no matter where it hits, and without any information or consideration of the appropriations involved, as in the case of the Interior Department appropriation bill?

Mr. AYRES. The gentleman is directing his question to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and not to the chairman of the subcommittee?

Mr. SCHAFER. I am directing my question to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I will repeat it. The Committee on Appropriations held extensive hearings on this bill. It was reported to the House of Representatives by the Appropriations Committee, which is the agent of the House. The Interior Department appropriation bill, containing certain appropriations, with a certain total, was also reported by the Appropriations Committee. Following the recommendation of its agent, the Committee on Appropriations, the House very carefully considered the bill under the 5-minute rule and passed the bill and sent it to the Senate. Then the other body arbitrarily reduced the total of the bill 10 per cent and, I believe, incorporated some 186 amendments which increased, decreased, eliminated, or added certain appropriations. This House was again called upon by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee after the bill came back to swallow every one of the amendments under suspension of the rules, with only 40 minutes' debate. We were told we must accept the bill with all its amendments in order to make the bill perfect from an economy standpoint.

I wonder whether the bill now being considered by the House is the real economy opinion of the Committee on Appropriations, or should the gentleman from Tennessee at the other end of the Capitol make another reduction of 10 per cent of the total, whether the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives will come to the House and say, "We were all wrong when we recommended the amounts reported in this bill," the same as they did in the case of the Interior Department appropriation bill?

Mr. BYRNS. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I think the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, of which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] is chairman, has performed a splendid service in the preparation and reporting of this bill. I think they have done a real service to the people and to the Treasury. They have made every reduction they thought possible, consistent with national defense. Too much praise can not be given them for that. Now, I am not responsible, and neither is the gentleman, for what the body at the other end of the Capitol may do. The gentleman says that a certain Senator is performing this job over there, but I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that while the Senator may have made the motion to cut these appropriation bills 10 per cent, it is the action of the entire Senate body. I, for one, believing in economy, believing in making every reduction possible, have made up my mind, so far as I am personally concerned, to accept every reduction they make in any of these bills [applause] and leave the responsibility with them as to whether it is sufficient to carry on the activities of the Government.

Mr. SCHAFER. That is a remarkable statement coming from the chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations, a committee which is the agent of this House. After careful and lengthy hearings and consideration they recommend to this House certain appropriation bills, and they say they have cut to the bone, and then, because another body arbitrarily cuts 10 per cent of the total, without realizing what activity of the Government is being crippled, we are told that we should swallow every amendment adopted by the other body. If that policy is to be followed, then in the name of economy we should make provision for the House of Representatives to dissolve and let the Senate legislate. I ask the Members of the House not to forget, if the Appropriations Committee does, that under the Constitution of the United States we have certain duties and responsibilities. If the Committee on Appropriations is going to follow that policy of betraying the House of Representatives whom they represent, and make it a cat's-paw and rubber stamp for the Senate, I call upon the alleged economy members of the Appropriations Committee to resign, so that we can have an Appropriations Committee that will not lead the House to slaughter because of a few political economy peddlers at the other end of the Capitol. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

PERSONNEL

Pay of naval personnel: For pay and allowances prescribed by law of officers on sea duty and other duty, and officers on waiting orders (not to exceed, exclusive of officers designated pursuant to law as additional numbers, 5,499 commissioned officers of the line, 908 officers of the Medical Corps, 186 officers of the Dental Corps, 556 officers of the Supply Corps, 83 officers of the Chaplain Corps, 233 officers of the Construction Corps, 109 officers of the Civil Engineer Corps, and 1,461 warrant and commissioned warrant officers), pay—$30,646,680; rental allowance, $6,098,515; subsistence allowance, $3,705,180; in all, $40,450,375; officers on the retired list, $5,800,410; for hire of quarters for officers serving with troops where there are no public quarters belonging to the Government, and where there are not sufficient quarters possessed by the United States to accommodate them, and hire of quarters for officers and enlisted men on sea duty at such times as they may be deprived of their quarters on board ship due to repairs or other conditions which may render them uninhabitable, $3,000; pay of enlisted men on the retired list, $4,419,910; extra pay to men reenlisting after being honorably discharged, $2,480,225; interest on deposits by men, $3,000; pay of petty officers (not to exceed 5,910 chief petty officers and 850 chief petty officers under acting appointment), seamen, landsmen, and apprentice seamen, including men in the engineer's force and men detailed for duty with the Fish Commission, enlisted men, men in trade schools, pay of enlisted men of the Hospital Corps, extra pay for men for diving, and cash prizes (not to exceed $71,500) for men for excellence in gunnery, target practice, and engineering competitions, $63,729,756, and, in addition, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed, upon request of the Secretary of the Navy, to make transfers during the fiscal year 1933 from the clothing and small-stores fund to this appropration of sums aggregating not to exceed $2,750,000; outfits for all enlisted men and apprentice seamen of the Navy on first enlistment at not to exceed $100 each, civilian clothing not to exceed $15 per man to men given discharges for bad conduct or undesirability or inaptitude, reimbursement in kind of clothing to persons in the Navy for losses in cases of marine or aircraft disasters or in the operation of water or air borne craft, and the authorized issue of clothing and equipment to the members of the Nurse Corps, $1,409,449; pay of enlisted men undergoing sentence of court-martial, $134,596, and as many machinists as the President may from time to time deem necessary to appoint; and apprentice seamen under training at training stations and on board training ships, at the pay prescribed by law, $990,420; pay and allowances of the Nurse Corps, including assistant superintendents, directors, and assistant directors—pay $613,900, rental allowance $35,520, subsistence allowance $19,272; pay retired list $47,641; in all, $716,333; rent of quarters for members of the Nurse Corps; pay and allowances of transferred and assigned men of the Fleet Naval Reserve, $10,451,941; reimbursement for losses of property as provided in the act approved October 6, 1917 (U. S. C., title 34, secs. 981, 982), as amended by the act of March 3, 1927 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 34, sec. 983), $5,000; payment of six months' death gratuity, $150,000; in all, $130,744,415, and no part of such sum shall be available to pay active-duty pay and allowances to officers on the retired list: Provided, That hereafter additional pay for making aerial flights or for duty on board a submarine of the Navy shall in no case be at a rate in excess of $1,100 per annum and $720 per annum, respectively: Provided further, That hereafter no enlisted man of the Navy shall be assigned to the Fleet Naval Reserve as provided for in section 22 of the act of February 28, 1925 (U. S. C., title 34, sec. 783): Provided further, That the total number of enlisted men in the ratings of bandmaster, first musician, musician first class, and musician second class on April 18, 1932, shall be reduced by 355 by discontinuing new enlistments and reenlistments not continuous in such ratings and/or placing in such ratings men otherwise rated.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. I make a point of order on the second proviso, beginning with the words "Provided further," in line 15, to and including line 19, just before the next proviso.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. GOSS. That it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I make an additional point of order on next to the last proviso, commencing in line 19 and including the balance of the paragraph.

Mr. GOSS. For the same reason?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, on page 1094 of Cannon's Precedents, under the chairmanship of Hon. John A. Buchanan, of Virginia, the ruling was made and later cited and approved by Hon. William L. Wilson, of West Virginia, that on an amendment offered—

"Provided, That no further contract shall be entered into by the Postmaster General under said act."

A point of order on the amendment having been raised by Mr. Dingley, the chairman held—

"The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois changes existing law, because it repeals the power conferred upon the Postmaster General by the first section of the act of March 3, 1891. As an amendment to an appropriation bill it must be germane to the subject matter and must retrench expenditures in one or more of the methods pointed out in the rule. The Chair is of the opinion that it does not do this unless by inference, and therefore is not in order."

Now, Mr. Chairman, reference is made in this proviso to title 34, section 783, of the United States Code, which states:

"That the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion and under such regulations," etc., "may require any person when first enlisting in the regular naval service and may authorize any enlisted man in such service to pledge himself to serve for four years in the Fleet Naval Reserve upon termination of enlistment in the regular naval service."

The proviso in the bill before us reads:

That hereafter no enlisted man of the Navy shall be assigned to the Fleet Naval Reserve.

It does not refer to a regular enlisted man or to an enlisted man of the regular Navy. I claim that it can not come under the Holman rule, because there is no proven saving to the country covered in this section. It is, therefore, not a limitation. Further, it has the tendency of repealing title 34, section 783, of the United States Code, which is at present existing law; and, repeating the chairman's opinion:

The Chair is of the opinion that it does not do this unless by inference, and therefore is not in order.

And further, it does repeal, or have the effect of repealing that whole existing law.

And if you follow it down further—I refer to page 31 of the report that refers to this section, and over on page 32, section 4—it states:

Enlisted men of the regular naval service assigned to the Fleet Naval Reserve in accordance with the provisions of this section, or enlisted men who within three months from date of discharge from the regular naval service upon completion of a four or six year enlistment, enlist in the Naval Reserve may, while so in the Naval Reserve, be permitted to reenlist in the regular naval service, in which case they shall be entitled to the same benefits as if they had enlisted in the regular naval service within three months of their last discharge therefrom.

Therefore there is no way to tell whether this would come under the Holman rule as a limitation, because no one knows when those enlistments or reenlistments expired or started.

Further, the existing law refers to the regular naval service, while in the bill it refers to enlisted men only.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I would like to supplement the statement made by the gentleman from Connecticut. Ordinarily the Holman rule is invoked as an exception to the general rules of the House when it is applicable to and operates as a limitation on an appropriation in the bill for that year only. It comes in like a camel's head under a tent for the purpose of limiting the specific appropriation in connection with which it is offered. This objectionable feature is not in the form in which the Holman rule has been sustained so many times. This is a bald, open, and deliberate undertaking to change the general law on the subject, not with relation to the dollars that are herein appropriated for the ensuing fiscal year but for all time to come, until Congress again by some legislative enactment may change it. That is a far different thing from the usual case in which the Holman rule has been invoked and has been sustained.

It is provided in line 12:

That hereafter—

Which means for all time to come. Here is permanent legislative enactment by the Appropriations Committee and not a mere limitation upon an appropriation for this year. The same evil is found in line 16. If countenanced, this will break down all distinction between legislative committees and the Appropriations Committee, and hereafter appropriation bills may contain any declaration of public policy or substantive law which that committee sees fit to put in them.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I had not quite completed my thought. I desire to refer the Chair to page 1094 of Cannon's Precedents, where this language is found:

Provided, That no further contract shall be entered into by the Postmaster General under said act.

I claim that the contracts referred to in this particular bill are entered into by the Secretary of the Navy, and I respectfully refer the Chair to that part of the section—that is, title 34, section 783—where it starts out by saying the Secretary of the Navy, in the place of the Postmaster General, as was under discussion at the time of the former Chairman's ruling. In my opinion, it clearly comes under that ruling.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, recent decisions of the Chair construing the scope of the Holman rule have gone pretty far afield. Those decisions are so broad that they are virtually supererogating to the Appropriations Committee legislative authority, which the Holman rule never intended to give to the Appropriations Committee or any Member on the floor.

Let us construe just what the Holman rule does, because there is before the Chair now the question as to whether there shall be any limit at all on the power of the Appropriations Committee or of any Member of this House in seeking to change existing law that squints at economy or whose ulterior purpose or manifest purpose is economy.

What are the three proposals that may be considered under the Holman rule, as written in clause 2 of Rule XXI? There are three proposals and three proposals only.

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject matter—

It first has to be germane—except such as being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States—

This certainly does not come within that category—

by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States—

Certainly this amendment does not come within that classification—

or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

There is nothing on the face of this amendment that shows that it comes within the last classification.

These are only three classes on which the Appropriations Committee or a Member of this House may justify an amendment counter to the general rules of the House.

Now, going to the proviso, the Committee on Appropriations is not a legislative committee and it does not come within that proviso.

I direct the Chair's attention to what is covered in the proviso:

Provided, That it shall be in order further to amend such bill upon the report of the committee or any joint commission authorized by law.

The Appropriations Committee has no legislative power. It is not authorized by law to change existing law. That rests with the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Or the House Members of any such commission having jurisdiction of the subject matter of such amendment.

Certainly that is not the proposal here, because there is no commission making a definitive proposal for the changing of substantive law which results in the reduction of expenditures.

Which amendment being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures.

Mr. Chairman, here we have the broadest kind of legislative authority being attempted by the Appropriations Committee. What is it? It says:

That hereafter—

Not alone so far as the appropriations as carried in this bill are concerned but for all time the Appropriations Committee is seeking to take unto itself the powers of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

That hereafter no enlisted man of the Navy shall be assigned to the Fleet Naval Reserve as provided for in section 22 of the act of February 28, 1925.

Certainly, if it were not for the Holman rule the Chair would unhesitatingly rule that this was legislation on an appropriation bill, because it interferes directly with existing law which gives the Secretary of the Navy full power and direction so far as the enlisted men of the Fleet Naval Reserve are concerned.

In view of the three designated classes which the Committee on Appropriations must show to bring it within the Holman rule there is, in my opinion, with all due respect to the great Committee on Appropriations, no authority whatsoever that will justify the great power which is sought in this instance, namely, of supererogating to itself the legislative power of the Congress where naval affairs are concerned.

Mr. BANKHEAD and Mr. LAGUARDIA rose.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard very briefly on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] want to be heard on his point of order?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There are two points of order and I would like to be heard on the one that I have submitted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is considering the points of order together, as they both involve the same point.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard following the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would prefer to hear first the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, with respect to the point of order I made to the last proviso, there is not even the semblance or the color of any economy or retrenchment, and the Chair can not infer, even by the remotest stretch of the imagination, any economy there. Why? It simply provides and legislates against any new enlistments. It does not reduce the number now in the service. It does not attempt to discharge any musicians now in the service.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's point of order was directed to the last proviso that provides for a reduction of 355.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But it does no such thing, as a matter of fact. It does not discharge a single man. It simply provides against any new enlistment, but every member now in the service may reenlist, and therefore it is purely legislation and nothing else. In fact, it is a mere declaration of policy. It has not even the color of economy. The amendment does not provide for the discharge of any given number of men. As the amendment now stands it suggests to the Secretary of the Navy that some time in the future in the case of a decrease in the number of musicians by death or otherwise, some time in the distant future because present personnel are entitled to reenlist, no new men should be enlisted. Surely this proposed legislation can not be brought within the requirements of the Holman rule. Further argument is unnecessary if the rules and precedents are to be followed by the Chair.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I shall make a very brief statement of my views on the point of order as to both of these provisos.

I think we should frankly concede for the purpose of this argument that both of these provisos do, as a matter of fact, constitute legislation upon an appropriation bill.

The only justification for their insertion and the only ground that is left for a vote by the Committee of the Whole on these two provisos is with respect to whether or not they come within the provisions of the Holman rule.

There is no dispute as to the citations offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Goss] or the interpretation of the rule as cited by the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. STAFFORD. I think we are all pretty familiar with the general principles involved in interpretation of the Holman rule. The Chair can not, by inference, read into a provision any imaginative economy, but it must be apparent to the Chair upon the face of the provision itself that it does, as a matter of language and as a matter of direct interpretation, come within one of the three exceptions set out in the Holman rule.

With this premise I want to read into the RECORD the statement made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] with reference to the status of these men that are involved in the first proviso that is assailed:

> We have a class of reservists, composed of what are termed "assigned" men. Assigned men are former enlisted men who, for a consideration of $25 per annum, obligate themselves to serve in the Navy or Marine Corps in the event of war occurring within four years from the date of expiration of their enlistment. You will find the law on the subject in full on pages 31 and 32 of the report.

I think the gentleman from Connecticut cited that provision of law in his argument, so it will not be necessary to restate it.

The sole question here is raised in view of this law which has been cited and which, perhaps, I should restate:

> The Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, under such regulations as he may prescribe, may require any person when first enlisting in the regular naval service, and may authorize any enlisted man in the service to obligate himself to serve four years in the Fleet Naval Reserve upon termination of his enlistment in the regular naval service.

This was an authorization under which the Secretary of the Navy could enlist these men. Under this proviso it is stated that hereafter no enlisted man of the Navy shall be assigned to the Fleet Naval Reserve as provided for in section 22 of the act of February 28, 1925, which is the act I have just cited. So the sole question before the Chair, as I understand it, is whether or not this prohibition set-up in this proviso does, as a matter of direct interpretation, reduce the expenditures out of the Federal Treasury.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. BACON. How does the gentleman interpret the word "hereafter"?

Mr. BANKHEAD. For the purpose of a proper interpretation of the Holman rule, I do not think that makes any difference. The question, as I understand it, is not necessarily confined to a reduction in the immediate bill. I think sufficiently wide scope may be given to it to make it permanent law, although as to that I may be in error. Nevertheless, that is not the decisive question for the Chair here to decide, and my interpretation of the proviso is that it necessarily follows that if any enlisted man can be enlisted, under the terms of the law I have just read, the necessary inference is that when you cut off or prohibit enlistments that are now authorized, you thereby reduce the expenses.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The Chair has carefully examined the language to which the point of order has been directed. The Chair thinks that his decision on this point of order should be governed by the last sentence of clause 2 of Rule XXI, which provides:

> Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States by the reduction in compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

That provision of the rule which the Chair has just read permits legislation on an appropriation bill provided it comes within one of the excepted classes just enumerated. The Chair thinks that the language to which the point of order has been made is germane to the bill under consideration. The Chair also thinks that the language reduces expenditures in at least two of the ways provided by the rule. The Chair is of the opinion that all of the language to which the point of order has been made is necessary to bring about the reduction sought. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. AYRES. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 23, line 8, strike out the figures "$30,640,680" and insert "$30,653,486, including not to exceed $1,014,250 for increase pay for making aerial flights."

Mr. AYRES. That is in accordance with the agreement this morning. I am going to offer another amendment in relation to submarines.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I want to offer to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment by Mr. TABER to the committee amendment: Page 23, line 8, after the word "pay," strike out "$30,653,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$30,242,680."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment I expect to follow later with the amendment that I stated when we were under general debate.

This amendment is designed to reduce the pay to officers by $400,000, and I expect to follow this by an amendment at the end of page 25, which will prohibit constructive commission services, so that the officer shall be entitled only to actual commission services.

My idea in offering this amendment is that there are a number of officers in the Army and in the Navy who, by reason of constructive service, are being paid large amounts of money which are not justified by the service they perform. They are being paid these sums because of some constructive service as an enlisted man or in the National Guard out of all proportion to the rank they occupy. For instance, there was the case of a certain admiral in China, and the pay of a lieutenant serving under him was greater than that of the admiral. These payments are out of all proportion.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There seems to be some confusion here. The gentleman from Kansas offered an amendment. Does the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York go over the figures of the gentleman from Kansas or under?

Mr. TABER. Under.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Did the subcommittee have any hearings on the proposition?

Mr. TABER. Simply as to the amount, the figures.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Then you had no real hearings?

Mr. TABER. No; not going into this in detail.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. And the subcommittee really never considered it?

Mr. TABER. No; they did not. It was brought up in the full committee, and I brought it up on the floor. I tried to bring it up at different times, but the others refused to consider it, not because they did not recognize its merits, I think, but for some other reason.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, in order to simplify the matter so that the House can consider it separately why not let the committee amendment be first adopted, and then have the gentleman offer his amendment, which will raise, as he knows, a very controversial question?

Mr. TABER. The reason is that under the rules I can not offer the amendment later.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The gentleman could ask unanimous consent, so that we may have the two matters put to us separately.

Mr. TABER. The committee can act upon my amendment and then can act upon the committee amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask this question. There is this danger, that if this amount is cut now, it will destroy the purpose that the gentleman from Kansas has in offering an amendment to maintain the flight pay. I am sure the gentleman does not want to confuse the issue to that extent.

Mr. TABER. I do not want to confuse any issue; I want it clear. Does this amendment of the gentleman from Kansas raise this sum?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes; it raises the figure now carried in the bill.

Mr. TILSON. What assurance has the gentleman that this deduction will be made from the sum he says it will? It is a lump sum; and why could not the reduction be subtracted from some other portion of the expense?

Mr. TABER. It should come out of this particular item, because this is the item out of which these people are paid.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. AYRES: Page 25, lines 12 to 16, inclusive, strike out the following:

"Provided, That hereafter additional pay for making aerial flights or for duty on board a submarine of the Navy shall in no case be at a rate in excess of $1,100 per annum and $720 per annum, respectively: Provided further."

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, that is in accordance with the announcement I made this morning.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYRES. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The purpose of the amendment is to strike out the reduction of the flight pay?

Mr. AYRES. The limitation.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Then the flight pay stands as it does now?

Mr. AYRES. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That means the existing law as it is as to flight pay?

Mr. AYRES. That is correct.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. AYRES. I hope the gentleman will not take any more time out of order.

Mr. SCHAFER. I do not intend to discuss politics, as I want to call to the attention of the members of the Committee on Appropriations and the Economy Committee certain conditions existing with reference to the Navy officer personnel from the standpoint of economy. I shall not take the five minutes if the gentleman will be patient.

I suggest that the members of the Naval Affairs Appropriation Subcommittee, the members of the Naval Affairs Legislative Committee, and the members of the Economy Committee look into an absolute waste of the taxpayers' money in so far as expenditures in the Navy Department are concerned. We have a situation in the Navy Department today which is becoming very expensive to the Treasury, because of a shortage in the number of vacancies in the higher-officer-personnel grades. The taxpayers of the Nation have been training midshipmen at Annapolis at a cost of about $16,000 each. Under the existing method of promotion in the higher-officer ranks we have a number of admirals sitting in star-chamber proceedings—a so-called selection board—plucking them up and plucking them down. This plucking board considers the records and ability of the officers, not in the rank to which they seek promotion but the recommendations of superior officers as to how they performed the duties assigned to their lower rank prior to the promotion.

It is a star-chamber proceeding without records being kept. These admirals on the plucking board choose, for instance, in the case of lieutenant commanders, which ones are to be selected for promotion on their record and, on the other hand, designate those who should not be promoted. And then all of these lieutenant commanders who have not been selected for promotion and who are in the prime of life and who have been educated at the Naval Academy at a cost of $16,000 to the taxpayers, after having 21 years service, are placed on the retired list to draw on the average $3,000 per year as long as they live without rendering any service. I want to suggest that if you want economy in the Navy look into this fraud on the taxpayers and bring legislation before the House which will cure this indefensible extravagance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the spelling of the word "subsistence," in line 9, on page 23, may be corrected.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment for the purpose of having the Clerk read in my time a telegram just received from Capt. Eddie V. Rickenbacker, American ace of the World War. It has to do with the gentleman's amendment, which is now before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the telegram, as requested.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the telegram, as follows:

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 22, 1932.

Congressman FRED A. BRITTEN,
House of Representatives:

May I enlist your sincere support in opposing the elimination of flying pay for Army, Navy, and Marine Corps pilots? My years of experience and close association with the members of these branches of our defensive arms recommend the maintenance of the high standard which has been developed as a guaranty that we may never again be confronted with the usual problems which faced us during the World War. It is my genuine belief—and I speak for a great many of my former comrades of the air—that not only is the elimination of flying pay false economy but would destroy the desire and ambition of our present service pilots, and would also work a definite hardship financially on them, as the individual expense brought about by the very spirit that exists to-day among our flying personnel makes it inadvisable. It is essential that this high standard and spirit be maintained in order that these branches of our national defense may continue as years go on to attract the quality of youth and intelligence which, in my estimation, is second to none throughout the world. The limited number of fatalities in the face of the tremendous hazards among the different branches of our Air Service during the past year is indicative of the qualities mentioned above, which should be maintained regardless of cost. The great majority of commercial pilots flying throughout the United States with our mail and passengers, both day and night, are graduates of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps flying schools. Again, proof that the necessity of the above is emphasized in the fact that America can to-day boast of the finest combination of commercial and transportation systems by air that exist anywhere in the world, which is the second line of our aerial defense in peace time, and from which would be recruited in time of national emergency the great majority of highly skilled technicians, administrative, and flying personnel. Implore you and every other Member of the House of Representatives to guard this spirit jealously in honor of that great body of pioneers of the air, both in peace and in war, who gave their all in the springtime of their lives that this generation and those yet unborn may be privileged to enjoy the peace and happiness we all so fervently desire. Certainly the very conditions which are to-day demanding the utmost effort in the interests of economy on the part of our representatives also demand judgment in bringing about these economies that are the result of calm deliberate reflection rather than hysteria.

CAPT. E. V. RICKENBACKER.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, at this time I desire to say that there are a certain number of officers and enlisted men (besides pilots) whose duty in connection with aviation requires them to make regular and frequent flights in aircraft. The number that can be so detailed is restricted by certain laws enacted by Congress, and the following are quoted:

[From an act, Public, No. 35, 67th Cong. (H. R. 4803)]

There shall be a chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics, appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from among the officers of the active list of the Navy or Marine Corps who shall within one year after his appointment qualify as an aircraft pilot or observer, * * *:

Provided, That not to exceed 30 per cent of the officers in each grade below that of rear admiral who fail to qualify as aircraft pilots or as aircraft observers within one year after the date of their detail into the Bureau of Aeronautics shall be permitted to remain detailed in this bureau: Provided further, That flying units or detachments, with the exception of aircraft carriers or other vessels, shall in all cases be commanded by flying officers.

Line officers detailed to command of aircraft carriers or aircraft tenders shall be naval aviators or naval aviation observers who are otherwise qualified. (44 Stat. 767, ch. 668.)

[From the joint service pay act, June 10, 1922, sec. 20]

Exclusive of the Army Air Corps, and student aviators and qualified aircraft pilots of the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, the number of officers of any of the services mentioned in the title of this act who may be required by competent authority to participate regularly and frequently in aerial flights as defined by such Executive orders as have heretofore been or may hereafter be, promulgated by the President, shall not at any one time exceed 1 per cent of the total authorized commissioned strength of such service.

Mr. Chairman, a previous law provided that one-half of 1 per cent of the total number of officers of the Navy could be detailed for duty involving flying, besides naval aviators, and receive flight pay. This law was later changed to the above; namely, providing that 1 per cent of the total number of officers in the Navy could be given flight orders.

The most recent law thus permits the Secretary of the Navy to detail to duty involving flying, with the award of flight pay, 92 officers. The Navy Department has never taken full advantage of this law nor employed this number, but has carefully restricted the number so detailed as much as possible. There are now 57 nonaviator officers instead of the 92 allowed, who have flight orders, including 27 medical officers, 12 aerologists, 5 naval aviation observers, and 13 others. The flag officers detailed to duty involving flying at present include two—the Chief of Bureau of Aeronautics and the Commander Aircraft, Battle Fleet, both of whom are naval aviation observers. There is also a captain naval aviation observer, ordered to command the carrier Lexington. All of these officers' duties require them to make regular and frequent flights in aircraft, and they have flight orders and the laws so intended. The law establishing the Bureau of Aeronautics requires the chief of bureau to be a pilot or observer, and that 30 per cent of each grade below that of rear admiral be naval aviation observers or naval aviators, the evident intent of the law being that they should engage in regular and frequent flights. There are two naval aviation observers, besides the chief of bureau, in the Bureau of Aeronautics, who were so qualified in order to comply with this law, and whose duties require regular and frequent flights in aircraft. Another aviation observer is the officer in charge of the naval aircraft factory. His duties require regular and frequent flights and he has flight orders. The flight orders of these officers are considered absolutely necessary and justifiable in every sense of the word.

It is highly desirable that a certain number of medical officers and areologists have flight orders. Their detail has resulted in increased efficiency and safer flying for all the personnel concerned.

It will be seen, however, that the detailing to duty involving flying of nonaviators is an administrative matter in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy, authorized by the above-mentioned laws, and that it was evidently the intent of the Congress in passing these laws that the Chief of Bureau of Aeronautics and at least 30 per cent of the officers of each grade detailed in the Bureau of Aeronautics, and the commanding officers of aircraft carriers, should be aircraft pilots or aircraft observers, and engage in frequent and regular flights.

The total flight pay received by the 57 nonaviator officers in the entire aeronautic organization who have flight orders is $95,145.

There are 1,097 enlisted men (exclusive of enlisted pilots) who have flight orders, whose total flight pay amounts to $688,851. These men are flying radiomen, gunners, and mechanics. It is absolutely necessary for the efficiency and safety of aviation that these men have flight orders. The number is restricted and kept to the lowest possible limit, as is the case with officers.

It will be seen that the authorization by law for flight orders to nonaviators was made after the most careful consideration by Congress and that the number awarded flight orders by the Navy Department has been kept to the lowest possible limit consistent with efficiency and safety. Proof of this is in the fact that only 57 officer nonaviators have flight orders, whereas a maximum of 92 is allowed by law. Likewise the appropriations for the current fiscal year carried funds for flight orders for a maximum of 1,600 enlisted men, whereas the average number of flight orders actually in effect has been 1,472, including enlisted pilots.

Mr. Chairman, as my good friend, Eddie Rickenbacker, indicates, the fact is well known that aviation duty is much more hazardous than other naval duty. The principle of giving increased pay for performing this duty has been established by the justice of law and of custom. For the Navy this increase has been 50 per cent of the base pay of all rates and ranks of enlisted men and officers. It has compensated them for the extra hazard of their duties; it has permitted them to make provision for the care of their families by life insurance, to purchase the additional uniforms required in aviation duties, and to cover the extra expenses which an aviator incurs in the execution of his duties and for which he can not always obtain recompense from the Government.

The officers assigned to aviation duty must fly. Their flying may be of different kinds, but the flying must be done. The ensigns, lieutenants (junior grade), and the lieutenants (second and first lieutenants) and captains of the Marine Corps on sea duty or duty in the field comprise the squadrons and fleet aviation units or the watch officers of our rigid airships. Their flying is intensive, dangerous, and mandatory. They can not pick and choose the kind of flying they want to do, the types of planes to fly in, nor the days on which they will fly. Their flying is dictated by rigid schedules of operation, which include gunnery, bombing, air tactics, scouting, patrol, observation, and all those functions included in war games. It involves flying off and on carriers, being catapulted from ships, landing and taking off from the open sea. Their operations are carried on far from land and even far from surface ships. For some of the marines it involves participation in actual guerrilla warfare, with casualties resulting from enemy gunfire.

These same officers—ensigns, lieutenants (junior grade), and lieutenants—when they go to shore duty become the flight instructors at the various training centers. They train students in flying day after day the year round, or they are assigned as test pilots at the various test stations, or as test pilots to fly planes newly overhauled, erected, or repaired. Their intensive and hazardous flying continues whether the officers are ashore or afloat. An increase in these officers' pay of 50 per cent is but just and proper to induce them to become naval aviators and to enable them to cover up with life insurance and other protection to themselves and their families.

The lieutenant commanders—majors, Marine Corps—come next in rank. These are the squadron commanders and executive officers of the Navy squadrons at sea, the executive officers of our rigid airships, or the squadron commanders in the field. They have all the flying, the same kind of flying, that the more junior officers have, but added to all that is the responsibility for the safe conduct of the squadrons to their objectives, the proper performance of the mission at hand, and then the safe conduct of the squadrons back to their carriers, ships, or bases. They have administrative and executive responsibility in addition to all the hazards of daily flying on naval missions.

Ashore these officers are the chief instructors at training centers, or the heads of departments at naval air stations, where their duties require them to fly intensively to supervise the work of their subordinates. Some lieutenant commanders are assigned as inspectors of naval aircraft, others to administrative duties in the Navy Department, but they all must fly in the execution of their duties. This flying includes the hazardous checking, testing, and inspecting of new equipment in the air. During the fiscal years 1929, 1930, and 1931 the average flying time for lieutenant commanders flying in all capacities was 140 hours per year. This includes every lieutenant commander, no matter what billet he was filling. An increase of pay of 50 per cent for these lieutenant commanders is eminently justified by the flying duty to which they are assigned and assignable.

Mr. Chairman, at this time it appears proper to reiterate that flying involves military or naval missions that may be of short duration, but full of action. In dive bombing, for instance, the pilot of a fighting plane can take off, drop his bombs, and be back on the ground in 20 minutes. If he does this three times a day, his total time for the day is one hour, during which time he has exposed himself to collision with other planes, the stripping of the wings from his plane, and to fire and engine failure caused by high-diving speeds. In aerial combat, a squadron may take off from a carrier, meet the "enemy," engage in all the hazards of the ensuing mêlée, and be back on the carrier in an hour. So on throughout the various types of aerial duties. Each flight may be short or long, but each flight on naval and Marine Corps missions usually contains some danger occasioned by naval flying duty.

Above the lieutenant commanders (majors in the Marine Corps) come the commanders (lieutenant colonels)—men who have passed through the hard apprenticeship of the lower ranks and who have been properly rewarded by promotion. These officers are the executive officers of air stations, of aircraft carriers, or aircraft tenders, of rigid airships, and administrative officers ashore. It has long been the desire of the Navy to have commanders (lieutenant colonels) in command of the various wings of aircraft. Up to now this has been impossible because, as naval aviation expanded, the demand for commander aviators in administrative and executive billets has exceeded the supply. As soon as enough commanders are available, it is planned to assign them as wing commanders. Their present duties are executive and administrative because the lessons learned during the days of their apprenticeship make them eminently fitted for such duty. They are employed on aviation duty because of their knowledge of aviation matters. Their flying is necessarily somewhat reduced because they are employed in positions which require their aviation knowledge, acquired in intensive flying, to administer naval aviation, but they must maintain that knowledge by flying, or their efforts suffer accordingly. New planes, new methods, new tactics, new policies, require their constant attention; and unless these officers keep familiar with the new things by flying, their value to the Navy will fall off proportionately. However, the fact that the number of flying hours is lowered, in no way influences life-insurance companies toward reducing premiums, nor reduces the financial obligations that increased rank and responsibilities have brought on, nor detracts from the justice of increased pay for hazardous duty in maintaining their ability and increased responsibility. From these officers are selected the captains and admirals for high command in later years. Their aviation experience must be capitalized, and their recompense must be such as to induce them to stay in aviation, otherwise their experience is lost, and their value for future aviation assignments is reduced. The average flying time for each commander for the fiscal years 1929, 1930, and 1931 was only somewhat less than that for each lieutenant commander.

Mr. Chairman, the captains in the Navy (colonels of the Marine Corps) are the commanding officers of aircraft carriers and tenders, of naval air stations, the chiefs of staff of the flag officers, and the commanding officers of rigid airships. Through these officers are executed the plans and operation of all naval aviation. The success or failure of these officers in their duties means the success or failure of naval aviation. In 1931 there were only nine captains in the Navy on aviation duty. The billets for these officers are filled as necessary, and each billet is of vital importance. During the past three fiscal years the captains on aviation duty flew more than the commanders did.

The three admirals on aviation duties are the high commanders. Theirs is the responsibility for all naval aviation. Their ability, their experience, and their courage control the destinies of naval aviation, and the efficiency of naval aviation may well mean the safety of the Nation. Many times 50 per cent increase in pay is too little for these men.

Their foresight and their immediate efforts may in one short decision put their value to the Nation far above evaluation in dollars and cents. Their flying to accompany their fleets of airplanes, in rigid airships, in furthering the development of the Nation's defense is hazardous. They have taken on many and unescapble obligtions, and they should accordingly be able to carry these obligations in a fitting manner. Their responsibilities are too great to justify any reduction in their increased pay for hazardous duty. Their flying is hazardous, but more hazardous to health and well-being is the responsibility that they carry for the lives of their subordinates. It requires much more courage to order a hundred planes into the air on a dangerous mission than it takes to pilot one of the hundred planes. It takes high courage to order a rigid airship on a new and untried kind of flight or to order the launching of aircraft from a carrier at sea in the face of darkness, low visibility, and other hazardous conditions. This courage takes its toll in health and happiness and it should be adequately rewarded.

The morale and efficiency of naval aviation are vitally dependent upon the services of the senior officers, commanders, captains, and admirals, many of whom have been with the naval aviation since its inception and who have brought it to its present high state of efficiency. In recognition of this fact, the Morrow Board went so far as to recommend "the giving of temporary rank as captain, commander, or lieutenant commander to any officer of a junior grade when he is detailed to duty requiring specialization in aviation and for which the higher rank is proper." The senior officers should be given an inducement, aside from a natural love of this branch of the service, to remain with naval aviation. They should and do fly as much as their administrative and command functions permit. It is manifestly unfair to expect them to continue in a duty which they know is dangerous for a decreased sum of money which would hardly cover the excessive life-insurance premiums they would have to pay. For example, a flat rate which would induce a junior officer to fly is not a large enough percentage increase of pay of the senior officer to cause him to overlook his responsibilities to himself and his family by risking his life at a time when he should be anticipating security for himself and his growing sons and daughters.

Mr. Chairman, a study has been made showing the savings that could be effected if certain flat rates of flight pay were substituted above certain ranks for the present 50 per cent increase. This study shows that if the average captain's flight pay ($3,000) were the maximum paid, the saving would be exactly $1,000 per year; if the average commander's flight pay ($2,450) were the maximum paid, the saving would be $19,600 per year, or 1.11 per cent of the total flight pay of all Navy and Marine Corps officers; if the average lieutenant commander's (major's) flight pay ($1,958) were the maximum, the saving would be $29,248 per year; and if one went down the list as far as lieutenants and made the average lieutenant's flight pay ($1,422) the maximum paid, the total saving would be only slightly over $100,000 per year, or the cost of two flying boats.

It is understood that economy is the sole reason for the suggestion that flight pay be reduced. The above study of changes in the system of flight pay shows that inconsiderable savings will result. Certainly the saving would be insufficient to compensate for the blow to the morale and efficiency of the officers concerned. The principle of increased pay for extrahazardous duty has been well recognized. It should be pointed out that if the pay of the Navy is cut in the interests of economy, such cut will automatically carry with it a cut in the extra pay for flying, because the increase now is 50 per cent of the person's base pay. Thus a cut in flight pay now plus a future cut in the pay of the Navy would cause a double cut in the pay of naval aviators.

Mr. Chairman, it has long been recognized that extra reward should be given for extrahazardous duty or work. This is true in all walks of life and is by no means confined to the armed services. In the business world it is impossible to get workers in munition factories for the same wage as those who work in cotton factories, or sappers and miners at the pay of ditch diggers.

Flight pay, or the extra compensation paid to those engaged in the extrahazardous duty of flying, has been recognized by the Congress as being just and equitable practically since the inception of military and naval aviation. It is recognized and paid to flying personnel in the service of all countries in so far as known. In 1914 and again in 1922 the Navy Department declared itself to be in favor of flight pay. The Congress recognized the value and merits of flight pay and provided for its payment by the necessary legislation. In 1925 the Morrow Board carefully considered this question and recommended:

> Considering the extrahazardous nature of flying, we believe that the principle of extra pay for flying should be recognized as permanent in time of peace.

The report of the Interdepartmental Pay Board of July 19, 1929, contains the following:

> The foregoing principles are not intended to affect the right of officers regardless of rank to receive special compensation while performing duty involving extra hazard as determined by the Congress.

Thus we see that the principle of flight pay has for a long time had the approval and backing of the Navy Department, the Congress, and of special investigators.

It has been pointed out that the principal of extra compensation for extrahazardous duty is so well recognized as to be almost axiomatic, and that flight pay has been so recognized by both law and custom as to be its natural corollary. Statistics covering the five calendar years 1926–1930 show the average annual death rate of naval aviators killed in aviation accidents to be 21.34 per thousand. The average annual death rate of all officers, excluding aviators, from accidental causes, for the same period, was 0.71 per thousand. This means that the accidental death rate of the aviator engaged in the normal pursuit of his duties was thirty times that of his brother officer during the above 5-year period.

In addition to the much greater probability of early death, the aviator is faced with the danger of injury to a far greater extent than is his brother officer on other duties. The line existing between fatal accidents and injury accidents is so fine that it is difficult to define. Luck, skill, split-second decisions, and lightning-fast executions frequently change a potentially fatal accident to a minor one with no injury to personnel. To cite only one example of many which frequently occur: Two planes in company were caught in a fog. One pilot, attempting to turn back to the clear, hooked a wing on the ground and both pilot and passenger were killed. The other landed blind, and, fortunately, striking no major obstructions, both pilot and passenger were uninjured. Personnel and material factors, and other causes too numerous to enumerate, frequently cause loss of life in a comparatively minor accident. In many instances, people otherwise uninjured are drowned when unable to extricate themselves from a plane which has crashed in the water. These very apparent hazards are not considered in the above comparison of death rates, and yet they are ever present.

Safety in operations has steadily increased and is constantly pointed to with pride. Let us consider this. In 1926 there were flown 4,380 hours per fatality, and in 1930, 14,710 hours, an increase in safety of operations of 236 per cent. The death rate for 1926 was 21.70 per thousand, and for 1930 it was 18.45 per thousand. Although safety of operations increased 236 per cent, safety of personnel, with which we are vitally concerned, increased only 15 per cent. Also for the year 1930, when the great record of 14,710 hours per fatality was made, the ratio of the death rate of aviators to nonaviators was 102.5 to 1, an abnormally high figure, showing that the extra hazard was present to a greater degree than ever before, even in our "safest" year.

One of the reasons for the above paradox lies in the ever-increasing use of aviation, especially in the fleet at sea. Naval aviation, being an integral part of our combatant forces, participates in practically all fleet maneuvers, and maneuvers at sea with aircraft are steadily increasing. Only the advent of more reliable power plants, radios, and direction finders, flotation gear and rubber boats, and other developments and improvements in recent years and the increased skill and greater experience of our aviators have prevented the death rate from being higher than it actually is. That the aviation hazard is considered real by senior naval officers in the fleet is shown by the following quotation from the report of the commander in chief of the United States Fleet in the 1931 maneuvers:

> I wish to call your attention to the fact that personnel of the air force in the air come nearer to operating under war conditions, so far as the hazard of their profession is concerned, than any other naval personnel.

Mr. Chairman, aside from death or injury in accidents, the aviator is constantly suffering deleterious effects caused by actual operations. The injurious effects are many, there being particular strain on the eyes, ears, and heart. The eye-muscle balance is subject to derangement because of the rapid change of focus required in constant shift from instrument board to far horizons. Exophoria and other eye troubles develop as a result of the goggles and the windblast.

Rapid changes of pressure and of temperature encountered in a dive of 10,000 feet or more aggravate infections of the sinus passages, the nose, and the throat, and at the same time are particularly injurious to the ears. There is almost invariably loss of acuity in hearing as a result of these factors, coupled with the constant noise of the engine. The pull-outs from dives and the rapid changes of direction and velocity in aerial combat produce a tremendous strain on the contents of the chest and abdomen, and may cause injury of such nature as to result in complete disability.

Since the human body is not adjusted to withstand the demands placed upon it by high altitude, there is, naturally, an unusual strain upon the heart and whole circulatory system when the pilot reaches excessive heights. The air is a new element for man; his body suffers in an attempt to conquer it. Until such time as evolution can so change his body to meet the new requirements, deleterious effects must continue to exist.

Mr. Chairman, all life-insurance companies consider that flying is an extrahazardous occupation. Some companies will insure aviators in the Army and Navy, but they require extra premiums of from $12 to $50 per year per thousand. Even the Army and Navy mutual aid associations exact extra rates. Some of the large companies, for example, Penn Mutual, Ætna, Union Central, and others, refuse to insure aviators.

The following table gives an example of the increased cost of insurance for aviators. The figures on costs shown in the first column were obtained from a well-known commercial company:

Insurance costs per year for $10,000 policy for man aged 25 years

	Non-flyer	Naval aviator
		$12 loading	Per cent increase	$25 loading	Per cent increase	$50 loading [1]	Per cent increase
Straight life	$147.20	$267.20	81	$397.20	177	$647.20	439
20-pay life	221.90	341.90	54	471.90	113	721.90	225
20-year endowment	403.10	523.10	29	653.10	62	903.10	124

[1] Loadings are the extra premiums required of aviators by all companies that will insure aviators. They range from $12 to $50 per year per thousand. The amount of insurance obtainable from one company is generally limited for officers required by orders to make frequent flights.

Mr. Chairman, it has been shown that extra compensation for hazardous duty is sound, that flight pay has always been considered reasonable and just, and that extra hazard does exist in connection with flying. Several methods for giving just, extra compensation have been proposed, the most prominent being:

(a) Percentage of normal pay (present method).

(b) Flat rate.

(c) Free insurance to those engaged in flying duty.

This is the present method and was adopted by Congress after due consideration. It is believed to be the best one for the following reasons:

(1) It has the approval and backing of the personnel involved and actually incurring the extra hazard.

(2) It is the most fair and just to the individual involved.

(3) It has the approval and backing of custom and Congress.

(4) It is not unduly expensive, as compared with other proposed methods.

In this connection attention is invited to the fact that as originally planned flight pay consisted of 50 per cent of pay and allowances. This has been reduced to 50 per cent of the base pay.

Mr. Chairman, regarding the flat rate, the contention is made that the risk for all flyers being equal the compensation should be equal. To this I can not subscribe. The senior officer is considered to be more valuable than his junior brother, as recognized by the fact that he has more experience, occupies more responsible positions, and is given a larger salary. Also he has greater responsibilities, especially as regards dependents, and the risk he runs as to his health is greater with age.

One fact that should be remembered is that officers rotate in their duties. A man occupying an administrative position on one tour of duty is, on his next tour, almost invariably ordered to duty in the fleet, where the hazards are multiplied. Even while on his administrative status he is often called upon to perform flights of extremely hazardous nature, so that it may be safely said that all naval aviators are, in the long run, subjected to approximately the same hazards.

A sum of X dollars may be sufficient to induce a young officer to risk his life in flying, because such sum is fairly large in proportion to the normal salary of an officer of his grade. With a senior officer this does not hold. His normal salary is increased over that of his junior by reason of his increased worth to the Government, his responsibilities, the demands made upon him by his increased rank as a representative of the Government, his dependents, increased insurance, and so forth. For these reasons his flight pay should be correspondingly increased. The officer of increased rank, such as the commander of a squadron, vessel, or air station, is responsible not only for his own life in the air but he must also assume the responsibility for the lives of his subordinates. It is as logical to contend that the six months' gratuity pay given to an officer's dependents in the case of his death should be the same for an ensign as for a rear admiral as to contend that all ranks should receive the same flight pay.

It has been proposed to substitute a flat rate of a certain amount for all persons engaged in duty involving flying, regardless of rank; in other words, to substitute a flat rate for the present system. Aviation had no representative on the Interdepartmental Pay Board, but in hearings before the board aviation personnel opposed any change in the present system of flight pay. The Interdepartmental Pay Board did recommend, however, a flat rate of $125 a month for all officers engaged in flying as a substitute for the present system of flight pay. The board made this recommendation on the assumption that its proposed increase of base pay and allowances would be adopted, and the change to a flat rate of $125 a month was coupled with this proposal.

At this point I desire to point out that the pay for aviators is in almost every case less than the pay recommended by the Interdepartmental Pay Board for nonflying officers in corresponding ranks.

I further desire to point out that if the flat rate of $125 a month were substituted for the present system of flight pay for officers alone it would cause an increase in the total appropriation for flight pay of $193,198. For officers and enlisted men there would be caused an increase in total appropriations of $1,660,519.

If the flat rate for officers only were reduced to $100 per month—$1,200 per year—the reduction or saving to the Government would be only $114,302. If it were further reduced—for officers only—to $83.33 per month—$1,000 a year—the reduction or saving would be only $319,302. If the flat rates were also applied to enlisted men, there would be a total increase—at the rate of $100 per month—of $857,119. Under the rate of $83.33 per month the total increase would be $321,519.

Mr. Chairman, the proponents of the flat-rate system argue, however, that the risk is equal and the pay should therefore be equal. If such a principle is accepted, the flight pay of an enlisted man under flight orders should be the same as for an officer engaged in duty involving flying. Consistency demands this.

I believe that a wrong impression exists as to distribution of flight pay in the various grades. An analysis of flight pay for the fiscal year 1931 shows that less than 1 per cent of flight pay is received by flag officers; 2.42 per cent by captains; 5.71 per cent by commanders; 16.43 per cent by lieutenant commanders; 36.41 per cent by lieutenants; 35.55 per cent by lieutenants, junior grade, and ensigns; and 2.59 per cent by warrant officers; 72 per cent of total flight pay goes to lieutenants, junior grade, ensigns, and lieutenants. Only 5.3 per cent—$66,400—of the total amount of flight pay went to officers on flight duty who are over 45 years of age. During the current fiscal year there are only two rear admirals on flying duty, so that their total pay is 0.6 per cent of the total officers' flight pay. Seven rear admirals who were formerly in aviation and received flight pay have returned to regular Navy duties.

Mr. Chairman, there is a general impression or belief that there will be a steady and great increase in aviators in the upper grades, resulting in a great increase of flight pay. Such is not the case, as will be seen from the following table:

Naval aviators and observers (U. S. Navy) by ranks, for fiscal years 1931, 1932, and 1933; estimated number that will be assigned on September 30 of each fiscal year

Rank	1931	Per cent of total	1932	Per cent of total	1933 (estimated)	Per cent of total
Rear admiral	3	0.45	2	0.26	3	0.36
Captain	9	1.36	10	1.30	13	1.51
Commander	21	3.17	29	3.77	29	3.44
Lieutenant commander	77	11.61	77	10.01	79	9.36
Lieutenant	258	38.91	266	34.58	268	31.75
Lieutenant (junior grade)	250	37.71	306	39.79	340	40.28
Ensign	22	3.32	57	7.40	95	11.26
Warrant officer	21	3.17	22	2.86	17	2.01
Total	663		769		844

It will be noted from the above table that the number of naval aviators in the senior grades (rear admiral, captain, commander) will increase slightly during the next few years to meet the actual needs of the service; a total of only 14 in the upper grades in 1933–34 as compared with 1931, whereas there is an increase of 173 in lieutenants, lieutenants (junior grade), and ensigns.

Owing to the newness of aviation there has always been a shortage of senior officer aviators, so that officers of junior rank have necessarily been assigned to positions commensurate with senior rank. However, the number in the three senior grades will stabilize in the near future, and the number in the senior grades will remain the same. Officers in these three grades will then be returned to regular line duties. Seven rear admirals who have served in aviation have been so returned already.

The increase in flight pay required for increases in the senior grades in the fiscal years 1931–1933 will amount altogether to $34,600. It will be noted from the above tables that the percentage of increases in the upper grades is practically the same, being increased in some cases and decreased in others.

Mr. Chairman, I can not too forcibly express my conviction that the substitution of insurance for flight pay would be ruinous to naval aviation. In the first place, insurance is the personal and private concern of the individual. The amount of life insurance that an individual should properly carry depends upon the number of actual dependents that he may have and the financial resources of himself and his dependents, and his financial needs. Therefore, it would not be justifiable to give to all aviators insurance for a fixed amount irrespective of the status of the individual as regards dependents, his personal resources, and obligations.

The principle of extra compensation for extrahazardous duty has been accepted as sound. In the case of individuals with no dependents, wherein would be the compensation received by insurance which they neither want nor need?

One important feature of this phase of the subject is the direct financial loss that would result from this substitution in the case of many officers. The majority of officers having dependents have used their flight pay to carry expensive insurance policies which they could not have afforded on normal salary, and they increase their insurance with increase in dependents. Since some of these policies now in effect are endowment policies, partly paid up, the revocation of flight pay would necessarily require the forfeiture of the policy, with a direct, unfair monetary loss to the officers concerned.

I have no hesitancy in saying that the extra compensation for the hazards of flying has been well deserved and has had much to do with the success we have gained in naval aviation. The equalization of material naval strength by treaty agreements means that superiority must be sought in personnel. I believe that we now possess that superiority and that it would be grossly unwise to sacrifice or to do anything to lessen the high morale, and with it the efficiency of naval aviators, in an attempt to effect a comparatively small monetary saving.

By hard fighting and constant loyal effort, especially on the part of naval aviators, naval aviation has been kept as an integral part of the Navy. United States naval aviation undoubtedly leads in the navies of the world to-day. In this connection I invite attention to excerpts from two articles which show the regard in which others hold us. First, Admiral Lord Beatty in a letter to the London Times under date of April 30, 1930:

SIR: * * * The navy to-day is the most up to date and efficient navy in the world, except in one respect, and that is the air equipment. The air wing of the United States Navy, owing to the single control exercised over the United States Navy, is far ahead of our fleet air arm. They carry out exercises on a scale quite impossible in our fleet. Cooperation between their ship-borne and shore-based aircraft has reached a high state of efficiency; with us it is nonexistent.

And second, an article appearing in La Revue Maritime, of November, 1930, which won the first prize in the Académie de Marine, France:

* * * The result of this organization is that naval aviation in the United States is much ahead of all others in the world; their Navy is distinguished by the prodigious development of its aviation, and particularly of its employment. It was the first to employ catapults, and it holds enviable rank among world's records.

Mr. Chairman, in recent years since the advent of flying we have built up in the Navy a great organization based on sound principles. The most important part of this organization is not the material but the personnel—naval aviation personnel.

United States naval aviation is on a sound foundation. Why do anything, especially anything of a doubtful nature, to shake this foundation, to upset and undo all we have so carefully and laboriously built up? Remove flight pay or drastically change it and you will ruin United States naval aviation morale as it exists to-day, and also Army aviation. I say this advisedly and from an intimate knowledge not only of naval aviation but also of the Navy as a whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Page 25, line 16, beginning with the word "that," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute amendment, instead of striking out the language just referred to by the gentleman from New York, beginning on line 19, page 25, strike out the balance of the paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BRITTEN: Page 25, line 19, after the colon, strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, that will have the effect of preserving music for the Navy. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York covers two provisos in the bill, and I am sure the Members of the House would much prefer to vote upon them separately. Particularly do I feel that Members of the House are interested in retaining music for the Navy. There is little enough in the Navy for the officers and men without taking from them this occasional music. [Applause.]

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. In view of the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, I would like to inquire if I will have an opportunity, after this vote is taken, to offer an amendment to strike out the proviso from line 15 to line 19?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition on my amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would not the object sought by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] be attained by asking for a division of the subject matter?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of that opinion, but the gentleman has offered it as a substitute amendment.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment which I offered. That will leave the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois before the House. After that is disposed of, the gentleman from Connecticut may offer his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk again reported the amendment offered by Mr. BRITTEN.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

I hope the chairman of the committee will state to the House that, as far as economy for the next fiscal year is concerned, there will be none effected, because any musician now in the service may reenlist. Surely all of the enlistments are not expiring this year. What will be the result? The result will be that as a musician's enlistment expires and he does not wish to reenlist, or he dies, his place may not be filled, so that it is quite possible a battleship may have a band that is absolutely helpless and unable to perform. If the musicians who play solo parts should die or be transferred, a band may be left entirely dismembered.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to point out that music in the Navy is not a luxury. It is a necessity. If 1,200 men are placed on a battleship or a group of Americans are stationed in any of the distant posts and they are left there day after day without some music to break the monotony, the discipline and morale will go to pieces. Why is it that every division, every brigade, and every regiment demands a band in times of hostility?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The only amusement that the men on the battleship have is the moving pictures and the band, is it not?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I am not talking about the amusement side of it. I insist that music, a band, is essential in any military or naval organization. It is almost impossible to go through the setting-up exercises unless there is music for the rhythm. The same is true as to drills. It is absolutely a part of the daily routine work. I say, Mr. Chairman, this subject can not be indifferently brushed aside. It is a most serious matter.

To take 355, or whatever number you want to reduce them, and drop them at once might support a plea of economy, but you can not make that plea when you have to wait until they die.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman be good enough to ask the chairman of the subcommittee whether or not it is intended to take the bandsmen off of battleships? I might say that these 355 men referred to were to be bandsmen in navy yards, and would include the destruction of the Navy Band, but would not apply to bands on battleships.

Mr. AYRES. That is my understanding of the matter.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It means that if the enlistment of a bandmaster expires he is out of the service; he can not reenlist.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No, no; it does not apply to reenlistments. That is why this amendment is worth nothing. A musician in the service may reenlist. The provision of the bill is:

> The total number of enlisted men of the rating of musicians, first class, and musicians, second class, shall be reduced by 355 by discontinuing new enlistments and reenlistments not continuous.

That means, of course, that every man now in the service can and will reenlist.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. AYRES. I should like to say that this matter did not originate with the committee. The Secretary of the Navy in a letter dated March 19, 1932, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Economy, at that time the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. BYRNS, indicated that the Marine Band would serve all needs of the Navy in Washington and that "military features" would not be affected if bands at navy yards, except Cavite, P. I., were discontinued. The Secretary specifically excepted bands at training stations and at the Naval Academy. The adoption of this course ultimately would dispense with about 355 bandsmen.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Secretary of the Navy is the last man in the United States who should take such a stand. Last fall when I objected to the Navy Band playing an admission concert in New York the answer was that the Secretary of the Navy put on his yachting cap and went to see a lawn-tennis game in New York and insisted on having the band with him. If the Secretary of the Navy recommends abolishing music in the Navy, he does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I believe that music in the Navy is absolutely necessary, not as a luxury, not as an amusement, but for the proper morale and discipline of the personnel.

Let me repeat for the third or fourth time that there is no economy effected by this provision. You can not prevent a reenlistment of continuous service, but you have to wait for these men to die.

So, let us not cripple the music of the Navy. I appeal to my colleagues to vote down this provision of the bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. This same Secretary of the Navy took the position in the name of economy that the Navy Band could not play at the United States Spanish War Veterans' reunion in Milwaukee, but at the same time they are making arrangements to have the United States Marine Band go to Canada and play God Save the King.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If anyone is to blame for the band not going to Milwaukee, it would be the Secretary of the Navy. I am not to blame for that. I am for the Navy Band playing for the Navy and not competing with unemployed musicians. I have a right to defend the Navy Band. I believe in the band for strictly naval purposes and am against this band going on a concert tour booked by a cheap private booking agent making money out of it. That is why I am sure the House will listen to my appeal to continue music in the Navy.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of my amendment.

I wish to take but a few minutes of the time of the committee to show the peculiar position into which these bands will ultimately be placed if the proviso in the bill is adopted. It provides that the bandsmen go out of service as they retire, not necessarily at the end of their 4-year enlistment, but as they retire, and their places shall not be filled.

It happens that this year one of our best players in the Navy Band will retire. He is an outstanding solo player. That place can not be filled and the loss of that instrument may destroy the value of the band.

If we are going to have music, if we are going to have a Navy Band, let us have a Navy Band that is second to none; let us have a real band. If we are going to lose the first cornetist and perhaps the slide trombonist and maybe a click-clack drummer and be unable to put others in their places, the result will be that we will have no band worth while and we might just as well discontinue it and refuse to appropriate for it completely. But in the name of Heaven, if this wonderful aggregation of players that we call the Navy Band is worth while, let us not destroy it by indirection. That is what this legislation contemplates.

Let the Navy have music. Let the people in Washington have music. Let the people all over the United States hear the Navy Band, as they do once or twice a week over the radio. No charge is made for that music. It is worth millions to the psychology of the people of the country. Who could fail to be happy when he hears some of Benter's fine music over the radio? I think it is better music than that of the Marine Band; it is more mirthful. If we are going to discontinue one of these bands, let us do away with the Marine Band. Let us put one of these bands out of business completely, but do not let either of them continue to be deprived of three or four important instruments. That is what the proviso does. I hope you gentlemen will vote with us to retain the Navy bands and retain music in the Navy. The gradual saving to be made is too costly. It is false economy.

Mr. Chairman, economy in Federal expenditure, as everyone knows, is to-day not a theory but a condition demanded at almost any sacrifice. There is one point at which the country has a right to expect the sacrifice will not be made. That is the point at which the interests of national defense can be imperiled.

Yesterday the House Appropriations Committee, continuing its sharp reductions of the President's Budget estimates, cut the amount recommended for naval requirements $31,921,657 below appropriations for the current year and $15,336,984 under President Hoover's Budget proposal. As left by the committee, the Navy for "direct" needs is assigned $326,340,466 for the fiscal year 1933.

The ordinary citizen—and as far as that is concerned, the average Member of Congress—has only limited knowledge of the actual necessities of the fleet. The country at large has confidence in the wisdom and patriotism of the men in charge of the Navy. It will be preponderantly inclined to believe that the House Appropriations Committee was ill-advised when it ignored the following message from Admiral Pratt, Chief of Naval Operations, which was submitted when Congress began consideration of the annual Navy budget:

> The Navy Department is constantly seeking means to reduce expenditures. One of the most obvious methods is to decommission ships. A careful survey is made annually and only such ships are kept in commission as are considered to be absolutely essential to provide security for the Nation and to perform the functions assigned to the naval service.
> Under stress of existing conditions we have cut our operating forces to the danger zone. We can not go any further without jeopardizing our national security.
> International conditions are such to-day as to render it unwise, in my opinion, to make further cuts in the operating forces of the Navy.

Mr. Chairman, little needs to be added to that sailor-like and statesmanlike declaration. Surely in a Budget aggregating four and a half billion dollars and in a proposed "omnibus" slash of five hundred million and odd it should not be beyond the wit of Congress to cheesepare in directions which will leave the Nation's first concern, its security, unquestionably unimpaired.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. AYRES) there were—ayes 67, noes 35.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. I move to strike out the proviso beginning in line 15, down to and including the colon in line 19, on page 25.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. Goss: Page 25, line 15, strike out the proviso beginning in line 15, down to and including the colon on line 19.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I have searched the hearings in connection with this particular proviso and can not find where any information is contained therein. I asked the chairman of the subcommittee how much would be saved through the adoption of this proviso and he told me $30,000.

I want to read from page 18 of the report.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It will save about $275,000.

Mr. GOSS. I wish to have the record correct. How will it save that?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Because this repeals a continuing law. It will save about $30,000 for the next fiscal year.

Mr. GOSS. I read the following from page 18 of the report:

> Besides the other limitations and provisions of a legislative character previously referred to herein, there has been included on page 25 of the bill a prohibition against assigning additional men to the Fleet Naval Reserve. A similar provision has been included under the Marine Corps section of the bill applicable to the Fleet Marine Corps Reserve. Assigned men are former enlisted men who, for a consideration of $25 per annum, obligate themselves to serve in the Navy or Marine Corps in the event of war occurring within four years from the date of expiration of their enlistments. In the committee's judgment, this is a needless expense.

I call upon the members of the committee who are interested in national defense as referred to by the Navy and the Marine Corps to vote to strike out this proviso.

I want to say we have an Officers' Reserve upon whom we can call in time of war, but that will not be true as far as enlisted men are concerned if this proviso should remain in the bill. These men agree, upon being paid $25 a year, to go to war upon call, and they are men who have been thoroughly trained in the Navy and the Marine Corps.

It seems to me this is silly economy and economy that is aimed at national defense.

I hope the committee in its wisdom will vote to strike out this part of the paragraph. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Goss) there were—ayes 49, noes 52.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

> In all, for pay, subsistence, and transportation of naval personnel, $149,045,405, of which sum $1,000,000 shall be immediately available, and the money herein specifically appropriated or transferred from the clothing and small stores' fund to this appropriation as herein authorized for "Pay, subsistence, and transportation of naval personnel" shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law and shall constitute one fund: Provided, That additional commissioned, warranted, appointed, enlisted, and civilian personnel of the Medical Department of the Navy, required for the care of patients of the United States Veterans' Bureau in naval hospitals, may be employed in addition to the numbers not specifically appropriated for in this act: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be available for the pay of any midshipmen whose admission subsequent to January 30, 1932, would result in exceeding at any time an allowance of three midshipmen for each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress; of one midshipman for Porto Rico, a native of the island, appointed on nomination of the governor, and of three midshipmen from Porto Rico appointed on nomination of the Resident Commissioner; and of two midshipmen for the District of Columbia: Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed to repeal or modify in any way existing laws relative to the appointment of midshipmen at large from the enlisted personnel of the naval service or from the Naval Reserve: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be available for the pay of any midshipman appointed from enlisted men of the Navy for admission to the Naval Academy in the class entering in the calendar year 1933 who has not served aboard a vessel of the Navy in full commission for at least nine months prior to such admission: Provided further, That hereafter no person holding a civil office or position, appointive or elective, under the Federal Government or the municipal government of the District of Columbia or under any corporation a majority of the capital stock of which is owned by the Government of the United States shall be entitled, during the period of such incumbency, to retired pay from the United States for or on account of services as a commissioned officer in the Navy or Marine Corps at a rate in excess of an amount which, when combined with the annual rate of compensation from any such civil office or position, makes the total rate from both sources more than $3,000; and when the retired pay amounts to or exceeds the rate of $3,000 per annum such person shall be entitled to the pay of the civil office or position or the retired pay, whichever he may elect: Provided, That the term "retired pay" shall be construed to include credits for all military or naval service as lawfully may enter into the computation thereof.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOYLAN: Page 29, line 16, after the word "holding," strike out "a" and insert the words "an appointive."

In line 17, after the word "position," strike out the words "appointive or elective."

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to this amendment. Under the language of the provision a distinguished Member of this House, the Delegate from Hawaii, would be precluded from receiving his retirement pay. There should be no objection to this provision applying to an appointive office, because in that case a man is appointed by some authority, but it should not apply to an elective office, because in the case of an elective office a man receives his mandate from the people. If we were to adopt this provision in the bill, we would prevent the Delegate from Hawaii from receiving his retired pay.

The pay he receives as a retired officer of the Navy is the pay due him for past services and for faithful service rendered to this Government as an official in the Navy. I can not understand why a provision of this kind should be inserted in this appropriation bill. There should be no objection, as I have stated, to an appointive officer but not to an elective officer, because an elective officer is a man who has been elected by the people, with full knowledge of his record, of his career, and the service he has rendered, and for which the retired pay is a just, fair, and equitable compensation.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is it not likely to be the fact that a man may be elected to office because of the service he has rendered to his country?

Mr. BOYLAN. Absolutely.

Mr. BRITTEN. And in the course of time such a man may be entitled to retired pay. Surely no one in this House would desire to take that away from him simply because he has been elected to office or because he has had additional glory forced upon him by his constituents. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BOYLAN. I think not, because they are just rewards for faithful service rendered to the Republic. Retired pay is not something discretionary or optional. It is something that is conferred upon a man because of service fairly and faithfully rendered. The mere fact that he is elected by the people should not militate against his standing as a retired officer.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. SWING. I do not altogether agree with the gentleman in his use of the word "reward." I like the idea that a man has earned it. It is like a man who has paid premiums to an insurance company over a period of time and finally becomes entitled to be paid a certain amount because of the premiums he has paid. His constituency knows he receives retired pay; and if because of their respect for him they desire in addition to give him an elective office, that ought to be their privilege.

Mr. BOYLAN. I think the gentleman's point is well taken, and I agree with him.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not get the distinction between the two. Is the gentleman in favor of the provision limiting the pay to appointive or civil-service personnel?

Mr. BOYLAN. No; I am striking out "elective" and leaving the word "appointive" in the bill. I say it should not apply to an elective office.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It seems to me if it applies to one it should apply to the other.

Mr. BOYLAN. The question has been raised as to a point of order, and it was stated that it would not apply.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. I will be pleased to yield.

Mr. AYRES. Does the gentleman see any more justice in submitting an appointive officer to this limitation that he speaks of than an elective office?

Mr. BOYLAN. Certainly. There is all the difference in the world. Anybody can appoint a man, but everybody can not be elected by the people as their representative.

Mr. AYRES. I will put the question in another way. Does the gentleman know any more reason why a man holding an elective office should draw two salaries than a man holding an appointive office?

Mr. BOYLAN. It is not a question of salary. As the gentleman from California has stated, it is a question of something he has earned. It is not making a present or gift to him; it is something he has earned by reason of his service.

Mr. AYRES. Does not that apply also to one who is holding an appointive office?

Mr. BOYLAN. That is not in the same category. The gentleman well knows that.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is not the fundamental difference just this? When you say to a person who is running for an elective office, "You are not eligible for that office," or "If you get the office you must surrender something," in effect that violates our theory of government. Very often a person who holds an appointive office has sought the position and he may be going into the same department. There is great danger in the Government appointing retired officers to positions in the same department, but when a person goes before the people and is elected to a certain position, to put a string on him and say that he must surrender something that he already has violates the real principles of our form of government; and as the gentleman well knows, if this provision goes through, a similar provision will be put on the Army bill and will take away the well-earned rewards of some of the most honorable and distinguished Members of this House.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman has well stated the matter.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. FISH. If the provision goes in the Navy bill, why should it not go in the Army bill?

Mr. O'CONNOR. It should.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman's point is well taken.

Mr. FISH. I would also like to ask the gentleman why the amount is placed at $3,000. Is not that rather high?

Mr. BOYLAN. I do not know. I am not in favor of this at all. I am trying to change it. I did not put the language in here, and I want it changed to strike out "elective" and have it apply only to appointive positions.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman is on the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BOYLAN. But not on this particular subcommittee. The gentleman has asked a question that perhaps could be answered by the chairman of the subcommittee. I can not answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. FISH. I will ask the chairman later on.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. With reference to an elective office, I doubt whether the electors ever take into consideration the amount of pay when favoring one for an elective office. Why should one elected to an office not be put in the same position with respect to an act passed by Congress as one holding an appointive office in so far as drawing compensation from the Government on two separate pay rolls?

Mr. BOYLAN. The distinguished gentleman knows that the people, in considering the qualifications of a candidate in an election, know all about his past performances, his record is before them, and if they did not desire to elect him, knowing him to be a retired naval or military officer, they would not elect him. The people pass on that, and surely the gentleman, believing as he does in our theory of government, is willing to abide by the result of an election, which we all must do.

I do not think it is fair to militate in this way against a Member of this body if he has been elected to represent his people. If they know he is a retired officer of the Navy, why should we put a limitation upon the amount of salary he should receive, inasmuch as the retired pay, as has been brought out by the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING] is not a reward, but something that he has earned on account of the service he has rendered the Government.

I do not think it lies within the province of the Congress to attempt to put a limitation of this kind in an appropriation bill. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, we have in the Government service some Army officers and naval officers who are performing services that involve expenditures of millions of dollars and who are in charge of the management of plants and activities involving many more millions of dollars. These officers receive the regular salary stipulated for the grade or rank of the officer holding the position, and they receive only their salaries, without any additional pay from any other source.

Other officers hold positions civilian in their nature, like the Governor of the Panama Canal, whose salary, I believe, is $10,000 a year. The Panama Canal pays that part of his $10,000 salary over and above the officer's regular salary. Another is the engineer commissioner for the District of Columbia, who is paid his salary plus the amount required to make his salary the same as that of the other two commissioners. There are other Army and Navy officers holding civilian positions in the Government whose salaries are regulated in the same way.

Mr. BOYLAN. But they are not elective officers.

Mr. COLLINS. I do not yield to the gentleman from New York. The rule of fairness does not vary, whether the position held is an elective or appointive one. The grade of the work done or the responsibility of the position should regulate the amount of the salary an officer should receive. That is the rule prevailing in civil as well as official life. Congress should not try to protect some one merely because he may happen to belong to this body.

A man is retired usually because of his age or because of physical and mental disabilities. This is true in the Army or the Navy. It is believed that when a man reaches a certain age his efficiency is impaired or that he has reached an age beyond which he can not render effective service, therefore he is retired. If an individual who has been retired goes into an office, either appointive or elective, he ought to receive the salary which the office pays and no more. I doubt seriously, with unemployment rampant, as it is, if men in a retired status, drawing large retirement pay, should be appointed to positions that others can perform equally well or perhaps better.

Something has been said about certain individuals in this House who have a retired status in the Army or Navy; that this provision of the bill will take from them the amount they receive over and above the salary of $10,000 paid to Members of Congress. That argument weighs lightly with me. I believe every man in this House ought to receive identically the same salary. I do not believe that certain ones ought to be selected and paid a sum larger than the rest of us merely because they held another Government job before they came here.

I believe when a man runs for public office or is appointed to public office he ought to take the salary that the office pays and no more. If he is elected, his responsibilities are not necessarily greater than another who was appointed to an office. A great many people believe in appointing officers rather than in electing them. The duties and responsibilities of the position is all that should be considered in fixing the size of the wage.

The public does not know whether an individual receives retirement pay from the Government when he is elected. They are not presumed to know it. He is elected because he is nominated by a political party usually. When he comes to the floor of this House or the floor of the Senate or elsewhere, he should be on an equality with every other person holding a similar position and all should receive the same salary, and no one should be placed in a preferred pay status and be permitted to draw a larger salary than the others. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, every dollar of retired pay is presumed to be compensation to a man for some kind of disability. He is presumed to be either disabled or to have reached the end of his full usefulness. He is presumed not to be able to render a full amount of service, and he is paid for it.

Why, we all know of the past years when our friend Admiral Benson drew an admiral's retired pay, and at the same time drew a tremendous salary besides from a corporation. We objected to it then but found we could not stop it. We all know that Gen. James G. Harbord draws the retired pay of a general, and at the same time for years he has drawn a tremendous salary, which they say is $50,000, from the Radio Corporation of America, and has for years. If he can render $50,000 worth of services to a corporation, why could not he have continued in the regular service of the United States Army?

Gen. Charles McK. Saltzman, chairman of the Federal Radio Commission, as a retired general, is drawing $6,000 retired pay and also a $10,000 salary additional as chairman of the Radio Commission. Gen. Pelham D. Glassford draws $4,312.44 retirement pay and also an $8,000 salary additional as superintendent of police of Washington, and he is able to drive his own motorcycle all over Washington, and is fit both physically and mentally. Why should he be doing it? And I want you to remember that each one of these retired Army and Navy officers, in addition to their retired pay, and their additional salaries, have furnished to them free an automobile and a chauffeur to drive it, and they get free from the Government for themselves and their families doctors, dentists, surgeons, nurses, hospitals, medicines, and every attention when they are sick. And also remember that they have the privilege as long as they live of buying all of their family and household supplies, including coal, from the Government stores at actual Government cost, and they use Government trucks to do their hauling.

Here is Gen. Mason M. Patrick drawing a general's retired pay of $6,000, and also $7,500 salary additional as head of the Utilities Commission in the city of Washington. Then, there is Gen. Herbert B. Crosby drawing $6,000 retired pay and at the same time drawing a $9,000 salary additional as Commissioner of the District of Columbia. Here is Gen. John C. Gotwals drawing a $9,000 salary as Engineer Commissioner, and has not rendered any service whatever therefor in months.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think the gentleman is slightly in error as to the retired pay of the Army and Navy. That is not exactly based on disability. It is based on length of service.

Mr. BLANTON. My friend is in error. I am not mistaken. I know what I am talking about. All of the facts and figures I have mentioned are true and correct. I am in favor of not retiring a single officer until he reaches a certain age, say 64, or else is retired for disability, because it costs $13,000 first to educate them at West Point or Annapolis and then it costs about $25,000 more to specialize their education for the next 25 years.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Not at this moment. One of our friends and colleagues here in the House, who draws retired pay, authorizes me to state for him that he is not in favor of officials drawing double and that he is perfectly willing to go along with us and help to correct this situation, which is justly causing dissatisfaction everywhere all over the United States.

I do not believe that any Member of this Congress can go home and get the people of his district to indorse the policy of allowing public officials to draw more than one salary at a time. It is not just. It is not right. We have 8,000,000 men, heads of families, now walking the streets to-day without jobs, hungry, if you please, with big officials here drawing $6,000 retired pay and then in addition drawing a Government salary of $7,500 to $10,000 per annum, and you are going to have a bill brought in here next week to reduce all Federal salaries above $2,000, and all of you are going to vote for it.

There are a few of you possibly who will dare vote against it, but most of you will support the reductions. You can not afford to vote against it. You are going to pass the bill by an overwhelming vote and reduce all salaries in this country above $2,000, and the President will not dare not to take his medicine along with the balance of us, nor will the Justices of the Supreme Court dare not to make the same sacrifice with all the rest of us. Anyway, we will try them out.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. I want the gentleman to understand he is not speaking for me when he is talking about reducing the salaries of poor postmen who are already underpaid.

Mr. BLANTON. I did not mention poor postmen. I am talking about reducing the big bugs, not the little ones. I do not want to reduce any salaries under $2,000, but I want to get at the big fellows at the top who are drawing two and three salaries.

We must reduce the expenses of this Government. I have been fighting here, earnestly and uncompromisingly, for 15 years to stop the waste, extravagance, and graft in Government bureaus and departments. I have been fighting to abolish useless bureaus. I have been fighting to consolidate departments, bureaus, and commissions, and to eliminate wasteful overhead now existing everywhere.

But every time the crisis is reached, and the crucial test comes, when we are to deny appropriations that the bureaus could get along without, there will be found here and there some friends of the surplus employees who ought to be taken off of the pay roll, who will get on the floor and make a strenuous fight to continue the appropriations, and they are usually continued. And real economies are not effected. And the spending goes on, and the deficits grow larger and larger.

We must not permit this amendment to pass. We must not allow these double salaries to continue. The provision that will stop double salaries was written into this bill by the Committee on Appropriations, composed of 35 earnest Members of this House. Let us vote down the amendment to strike it out.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BOYLAN) there were—ayes 30, noes, 69.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT

For surgeon's necessaries for vessels in commission, navy yards, naval stations, and Marine Corps; and for the civil establishment at the several naval hospitals, navy yards, naval medical supply depots, Naval Medical School and dispensary, Washington, and Naval Academy; for tolls and ferriages; purchase of books and stationery; hygienic and sanitary investigation and illustration; sanitary, hygienic, administrative, and special instruction, including the issuing of naval medical bulletins and supplements; purchase and repairs of nonpassenger-carrying wagons, automobile ambulances, and harness; purchase of and feed for horses and cows; maintenance, repair, and operation of three passenger-carrying motor vehicles for naval dispensary, Washington, D. C., and of one motor-propelled vehicle for official use only for the medical officer on out-patient medical service at the Naval Academy; trees, plants, care of grounds, garden tools, and seeds; incidental articles for the Naval Medical School and naval dispensary, Washington, naval medical supply depots, sick quarters at Naval Academy and marine barracks; washing for medical department at Naval Medical School and naval dispensary, Washington, naval medical supply depots, sick quarters at Naval Academy and marine barracks, dispensaries at navy yards and naval stations, and ships; and for minor repairs on buildings and grounds of the United States Naval Medical School and naval medical supply depots; rent of rooms for naval dispensary, Washington, D. C., not to exceed $1,200; for the care, maintenance, and treatment of the insane of the Navy and Marine Corps on the Pacific coast, including supernumeraries held for transfer to the Government Hospital for the Insane; for dental outfits and dental material; and all other necessary contingent expenses; in all, $1,840,000: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for employees assigned to Group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the schedule of wages for civil employees in the field service of the Navy Department shall not exceed $200,000.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out $200,000. I want to keep the record straight after the speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. He apparently fails to realize that the retirement pay of regular Navy and Army officers is in fact considered as a part of their compensation when on active duty. When salaries were being raised in Federal and municipal governments and in private institutions the salaries of this personnel were not increased. While in the active service Army and Navy officers have to move all over the world, with their furniture and baggage and families, and in many cases have to send the children to private schools because public schools are not available. I do not believe that the gentleman from Texas would desire to support himself and family on some of the salaries of the Army and Navy officers, even if he did not have some of the unusual expenses by reason of changing the station of his place of employment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Naval lighter-than-air base, Sunnyvale, Calif.: To continue construction and improvements as authorized by the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to accept, without cost to the Government of the United States, a lighter-than-air base, near Sunnyvale, Calif., in the county of Santa Clara, State of California, and construct necessary improvements thereon," approved February 12, 1931, in addition to the contract authorization contained in the second deficiency act, fiscal year 1931, approved March 4, 1931, $1,000,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the construction of quarters for commissioned officers to cost in excess of the respective limits fixed by law for quarters for commissioned officers of corresponding rank in the Army.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DARROW: On page 39, after line 4, insert a separate paragraph, as follows:

"Naval Hospital, Philadelphia, Pa.: To continue construction of the public works authorized by the act entitled 'An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works at Philadelphia, Pa., and for other purposes,' approved February 12, 1932 (46 Stat. 1091), subject to the limit of cost fixed by such act, the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to expend $1,000,000 from the naval-hospital fund for the buildings, equipment, accessories, and appurtenances authorized by such act, in addition to the expenditures authorized from such fund by such act."

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman intend to make his point of order?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think it would be well to have it passed on now if the gentleman prefers.

Mr. DARROW. I would like to have the point of order discussed.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will reserve it if the gentleman desires.

Mr. DARROW. It does seem to me that this point of order is not well taken.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. What authority in law is there for using the Navy hospital fund for the purpose of building this hospital in excess of the sum authorized by the legislative committee, of which the gentleman is a member?

Mr. DARROW. In the act authorizing this construction, which was approved in the last Congress on the 12th of February, 1931, there was an authorization, and also an authorization to take from this fund $300,000, $200,000 of which was for the purchase of a site and $100,000 for the preparation of the plans. The site has been purchased and the plans have been prepared, and it was not a limitation, nor did it in any way indicate that other amounts should not be taken from that item. It does not seem to me in this case, because the authorization has been made, that the point of order would lie against it under those circumstances.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The Navy hospital fund is supported by a tax of 20 cents per month collected from the officers and men of the Navy and of the pensions of the inmates of the Naval Home at Philadelphia, Pa., together with the balance of fines and forfeitures imposed by naval courts-martial not needed for transportation, and so forth, of discharged prisoners to their homes.

This amendment would seem to be a diversion.

In the authorization for this hospital the legislative committee provided $300,000 of the fund to be used for this purpose. There seems to be no authorization for a larger sum to be used. It would appear that the authorization by the legislative committee was necessary, and they expressly fixed the amount at $300,000—fixing the definite purposes for which it should be used.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARROW. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin to discuss the point of order.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, at the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARROW] on yesterday I have given more than passing consideration to the question as to whether the amendment recommended by the Budgetary Office would be in order on the appropriation bill.

My argument will be somewhat elaborate. I wish to call attention first to the existing law, as far as the naval fund is concerned. The question here involved is whether the Treasury of the United States shall be called upon to pay $900,000 or whether the naval-hospital fun may be substituted to that extent for construction purposes.

All the laws relating to the naval-hospital fund are found collated in the hearings on the Navy appropriation bill of 1926 on pages 821 et seq.

By the bye, this 20 cents per head which the gentleman from Alabama referred to as being the contribution and basis for this naval-hospital fund was enacted at the very beginning of our Government in 1798 and has been the law ever since.

On page 822 of the hearings, where all the laws were collated at the request of the chairman of the committee, to have them embodied for all time, we find this statement:

The acts of February 26, 1811, and July 10, 1832, when later condensed, were reenacted into section 4810 of the Revised Statutes, which stood without change from 1874 until March 4, 1913, when it was reenacted by Congress without change in the original language, except by the addition of a proviso as shown.

I am now reading section 4810, with the added proviso, which was passed on March 4, 1913:

SEC. 4810. The Secretary of the Navy shall procure at suitable places proper sites for Navy hospitals, and if the necessary buildings are not procured with the site, shall cause such to be erected, having due regard to economy, and giving preference to such plans as with most convenience and least cost will admit of subsequent additions, when the funds permit and circumstances require; and shall provide, at one of the establishments, a permanent asylum for disabled and decrepit Navy officers, seamen, and marines.

That was the law up to 1913. The Secretary of the Navy had absolute authority to use any of the naval-hospital fund for the purchase of sites and the construction of buildings without limitation by Congress. The proviso which was adopted in that year is as follows:

Provided, That hereafter no site shall be procured or hospital building erected or extensions to existing hospitals made unless hereafter authorized by Congress.

Again I read:

Provided, That hereafter no site shall be procured or hospital building erected or extensions to existing hospitals made unless hereafter authorized by Congress.

Now, I contend that the Congress did last year provide this definitive proposal to erect a naval hospital at Philadelphia.

There is no denying the fact that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania would offer an amendment providing for this work and that $1,000,000 should be appropriated from the Treasury it would be in order on this appropriation bill. I bottom my whole argument upon the fact that that would be in order.

The question which is very likely troubling the Chair, and also the parliamentary adviser, is whether the fact that in the authorization bill the proviso said that of the above amounts, namely, the full amount of $3,000,000 for construction purposes, that of the above amounts $200,000 shall be used for the purchase of land and $100,000 for the buildings, equipments, accessories, and appurtenance, and so forth, $300,000 shall be expended from the naval-hospital fund. This amendment that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has offered seeks to appropriate the additional amount for construction up to $1,000,000 from the naval hospital fund.

Now, follow me closely. I said a moment ago that I bottom my argument on the fact that it would be in order for the gentleman to offer an amendment providing for an expenditure of $1,000,000 from the Treasury of the United States for the construction of this hospital. There can be no denying that, because it is authorized. Suppose the gentleman had offered that amendment and that amendment were pending before the committee, and that I, as a Member of the House, offered the amendment proposed by the gentleman as a substitute. Would that amendment, being germane, be in order? That is the one question that is before the House, and I maintain with all the strength I have that it would be in order under the Holman rule. Under what part of the Holman rule do I contend it would be in order? Before I read the Holman rule, let me call attention to the fact that the organic act has placed a limitation of $300,000 as the amount that shall be used of the naval-hospital fund. Therefore, the Secretary of the Navy would have the right to use the naval-hospital fund upon his own motion for this construction when once the construction is authorized without further ado by Congress. Why? We find at page 823 in the interpretative part of that authorization that that year there was spent for reconstruction $282,000.

But now I am going back to my original proposal, that it can not be denied that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania had offered an amendment providing for an appropriation from the Treasury of $1,000,000 for the construction of the naval hospital at Philadelphia, it would have been in order, and I then would be entitled to offer the amendment that he has now offered, which is the budgetary estimate.

Why do I say it would be offered as a germane amendment? The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole just a moment ago gave a very broad construction to the Holman rule. The proposal, which is now before the committee for consideration, on its face shows that there would be a saving. There would be a saving to the Government of appropriations under the last clause of the Holman rule, which says:

Or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

Understand me clearly, the gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment that is in order on this bill providing for the authorization of $1,000,000 for that construction, and it is in order because it is authorized by law. Then I offer an amendment as proposed by the gentleman providing that $1,000,000 shall be obtained from the hospital fund. On its face the amendment would be shown to be germane in character, that it was an amendment coming within the third provision of the Holman rule with respect to reductions of money covered by the bill. You can not escape the logic of the argument.

Now, are we going to make this in order by the circuitous proposal that there shall be offered an original proposal that a million dollars shall be paid out of the Treasury for the construction of this naval hospital at Philadelphia and then the gentleman from Pennsylvania will offer his amendment in order to make it in order? Under the case I have suggested, it would be in order. Then, of course, the chairman would have to hold in order the present amendment.

I make a further argument based on the organic act, but I make my strong holding on the fact that this proposal of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a germane amendment to an amendment offered by me or any other Member of the House providing for the appropriation of $1,000,000 from the Treasury. This would be a clear saving of money, because it would not be out of the Treasury, but it would be out of the naval-hospital fund.

Although the original act said that not more than $300,000 shall be expended from the naval-hospital fund, that does not prevent Congress, under its rules, from providing for more being spent in that way, because it is not in violation of existing law.

The existing law clearly shows that for construction purposes this money may be paid out of the naval-hospital fund.

For the benefit of the parliamentary adviser I again call his attention to section 4810, with the proviso that was adopted on March 4, 1913, which reads as follows:

Provided, That hereafter no site shall be procured or hospital buildings erected or extensions to existing hospitals made unless hereafter authorized by Congress.

Gentlemen, if it had not been for that cost of $300,000 there would have been no question whatsoever that this money could have been used from the naval-hospital fund.

In view of the fact that the organic law provides that it may be used without limit and that the third classification of the Holman rule provides that it shall be in order if there is a saving to the Government, I respectfully contend that it is in order for the reasons I have stated.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FULLER). The Chair is prepared to rule. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken. The Chair can see no connection with the Holman rule. The law which has been referred to as providing for the building of a hospital in Philadelphia was a general law authorizing appropriations for that purpose. In that law it is specifically provided that $300,000 of the Navy-hospital fund may be used for the purpose of constructing the hospital. Under the amendment offered it is proposed to appropriate $1,000,000 out of the hospital fund, which changes the law to that extent. The amendment changes existing law and is therefore legislation.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DARROW: On page 39, after line 4, insert as a separate paragraph the following:

"Naval hospital, Philadelphia, Pa.: To continue construction of the public works authorized by the act entitled 'An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to proceed with the construction of certain public works at Philadelphia, Pa., and for other purposes,' approved February 12, 1931 (46 Stat. 1091), subject to the limit of cost fixed by such act, $1,000,000."

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Chairman, I want to appeal to members of the committee, with all the earnestness I have, for the adoption of this amendment.

The increasing urgency for an early start on the construction of the Philadelphia Naval Hospital has become so great that the President of the United States sent a special message to Congress transmitting a supplemental estimate from the Bureau of the Budget to enable the Secretary of the Navy to use $1,000,000, of the naval-hospital fund for this purpose. Such action was approved by the Secretary of the Navy, by the Bureau of the Budget and by the President of the United States. It is very clear to me this is the most urgent construction required anywhere in the country.

I want to give you, if I may, a brief description of the present hospital buildings. There are 34 in number. They are of a very flimsy wooden-type construction, mostly stucco on wood laths, built for war-time emergencies. They are built on wooden piles, about two feet or two and a half feet from the ground. They have been decaying so rapidly that the sills are rotting away. The buildings are sagging, and in many instances the heating pipes and plumbing have been disconnected. Captain Dennis told me a few days ago that when he visited these buildings in September last, during a heavy rain, he saw the patients, eating in the mess hall with umbrellas over them to keep from getting wet. The buildings being grouped closely together, and because of this flimsy construction, we have there one of the greatest fire hazards which you can conceive. Should a fire break out, the loss of life, I am afraid, would be appalling.

It seems to me a crime and a disgrace for this Government to keep men housed in buildings of that character. I know the committee made a comparison between certain wooden structures at Pensacola, Fla., Parris Island, and Charleston, S. C., but those buildings are mostly one-story and were built of a permanent character as far as wooden buildings can be built, and there is no comparison between conditions there and conditions in Philadelphia.

There are upwards of 465 veterans being treated at this hospital in addition to the Navy personnel. It is the only general and surgical hospital anywhere near this locality for veteran patients as well as for patients of the Navy. The nearest Veterans' Bureau hospital at the present time is at Hartford, Conn., and we must find some place for those who require general and surgical attention.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DARROW. Every veterans' organization in the State of Pennsylvania as well as veterans' organizations in near-by States are pleading for this more earnestly, I believe, than anything else. To deny them these facilities and subject those patients to that terrible risk of fire is a crime and a disgrace.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any Army hospital or any veterans' hospital nearer to that at League Island than the Walter Reed Hospital, which gives attention to general hospital patients?

Mr. DARROW. There is not.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is none proposed by the Veterans' Bureau or in course of construction, and it is proposed to utilize some of these beds for veteran patients.

Mr. DARROW. That is true. The reason for combining the two in one hospital is on account of the great economy which can be effected. According to the last report of the Surgeon General of the Navy, and General Hines, of the Veterans' Bureau, it was clearly shown that for general and surgical classes of patients there was a saving of 93 cents per day per man if hospitalized in a naval hospital?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Where is this hospital located in Philadelphia?

Mr. DARROW. The present hospital is in the navy yard. We have purchased a beautiful site of 22 acres and a fraction, facing League Island Park, within about a half mile from the navy yard, where they will always have a beautiful and open recreation space.

The site has been purchased, the plans have been prepared and we are ready to go ahead, and if there is anything that is needed as much as this, I do not know where it is.

I plead with you to grant this appropriation. I had hoped that a point of order would not be made against my first amendment, because the naval-hospital fund is intended for this very purpose and yet, on a point of order, you do not permit it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is that fund sufficiently large to construct this hospital?

Mr. DARROW. The naval-hospital fund at the present time has about $1,250,000 in it. According to the Surgeon General, there will be an addition to that fund of over $800,000 during the next fiscal year.

I can not feel that there is any new construction anywhere in the United States the demand for which is at all comparable with this, and the amendment ought to be adopted even if we take the funds from the Treasury of the United States.

I appeal to you in behalf of the veterans who are hospitalized there, and in behalf of the naval patients, to grant this appropriation.

I understand that some naval officer intimated to the committee that this is not essential at this time. I have looked through the hearings and I can not find anything in them to that effect. The Secretary of the Navy has approved this proposal in writing, and while I am a thorough believer in a strong Navy, I can not understand how anyone could be so hard-hearted as to want nothing but ships and men and give no attention to the poor unfortunates who have given their services and have become disabled. I do not see how anyone, even though he may be a high ranking officer in the Navy, could make any such statement, off the record.

Mr. Chairman, I wish I could have the Members see the condition of these buildings. I have here photographs of them, showing that the sills have rotted away and that the buildings are in a most deplorable condition. They constitute an extreme fire hazard, and continuous supervision, inspection, and care are necessary to guard against fire. The hospital is usually filled to capacity and the conditions in case of fire present a serious menace to the life of the patients. The complete replacement of the present hospital is a very urgent necessity, and, as construction costs are now so favorable, this is a most opportune time to proceed with its building.

The authorization for the construction of this hospital, enacted on February 12, 1931, provided that $200,000 for the purchase of the site and $100,000 for the preparation of plans be made available from naval-hospital fund.

The site has been purchased. It is a tract of 22.1 acres, splendidly located, near the Philadelphia Navy Yard, on Pattison Avenue between Sixteenth and Nineteenth Streets, facing League Island Park, and it is considered an ideal location. The price paid is about $60,000 below the sum authorized.

The architects' plans have been approved, and within the limits of the authorized appropriation I believe we will obtain the most modern, the most useful, and the most economical hospital building to be had.

Probably I should further emphasize the fact that while this is a naval hospital, officered and manned by naval personnel, it is to a great extent used by disabled veterans under the jurisdiction of the Veterans' Administration. This arrangement is entirely satisfactory and desired by General Hines, of the Veterans' Administration, with whom I have been in frequent consultation on this subject. It has the hearty indorsement and approval of the President, of the Secretary of the Navy, of the Chief of the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery, and the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks. Our veterans' organizations are urgent in their demand for new, modern, and fireproof facilities, where patients may receive care and treatment with safety and without the threat of fire hazards.

Gentlemen, I am pleading for your support of this amendment. Even with the spirit of economy which all of us wish to practice in face of the present economic conditions, I feel justified in asking your support for this appropriation and feel that such action can not be criticized, for I can not conceive that anyone anywhere would want a member of his family or a sick and disabled veteran or service man treated under conditions now existing at this hospital. This proposal is most meritorious, and I request that it be given your support.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

What the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARROW] has said relative to a supplemental estimate being sent down to the committee is true. The estimate was received after we practically had completed our hearings and were ready to frame the bill. The committee, following the principle which it was understood was applied in the preparation of the original Budget, that no funds would be recommended for undertaking new work, concluded to make no provision for initiating this project.

From a purely naval standpoint the hospital is not required, and its erection is not advocated by the regular administrative officials of the Navy. Admiral Pratt, who is Chief of Operations, stated before our committee that it is not required; and so did the Secretary of the Navy, for that matter.

There are many places in the country that need a permanent hospital just as much as Philadelphia.

The Navy at this time has 5,071 beds in fire-resistant buildings, and on November 11 last the Navy patients numbered 2,514, or about one-half the number of patients for which we have beds in fire-resistant buildings. It is true that the present hospital at Philadelphia is entirely of temporary construction, but this is also true as to Charleston, S. C., Parris Island, S. C., and Pensacola, Fla., while at many other places, as will be seen from the table on page 746 of the hearings, both permanent and temporary facilities exist, the latter being the more commodious, in two or three instances, particularly at Great Lakes, Ill.

There is no more need, from a naval standpoint, to have this hospital for these patients at Philadelphia than at Pensacola or Charleston, S. C., or any of these other places.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYRES. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not generally accepted that League Island Navy Yard is a live navy yard, whereas Pensacola and Charleston are being considered for abandonment?

Mr. AYRES. No; not at all.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not generally accepted that the Secretary of the Navy has recommended the abandonment of the yard at Charleston?

Mr. AYRES. There has been no suggestion to close Pensacola or to abandon activities at or in the vicinity of Charleston to an extent that would justify closing the hospital there.

Mr. STAFFORD. Charleston is being considered for abandonment, and Pensacola was considered a raid on the Treasury when it was established years back through the efforts of a Senator from that State.

Mr. AYRES. The navy yard is the only activity at Charleston which has been considered for abandonment. The Marine Corps activities at Parris Island are near by. The gentleman will recall, I am sure, that the Navy's flying school is maintained at Pensacola.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Could not these beds be used by the veterans? If you try now to get a veteran in the hospital, they tell you there are 40 or 50 ahead of him.

Mr. AYRES. The larger portion of the patients in these hospitals are veteran patients.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Why could we not have these facilities provided for the veterans? We need them for some of our people in Maryland.

Mr. AYRES. Then I say to the gentleman from Maryland that it should be paid for out of the veterans' fund. The gentleman knows that the Veterans' Bureau is building hospitals all over the United States. Why have the Navy build a hospital for the purpose of housing veterans?

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYRES. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not the fact that the Veterans' Bureau wishes this new building constructed so as to accommodate the veterans, and that they are not planning for any general hospitals for veterans this side of the Allegheny Mountains?

Mr. AYRES. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have made inquiry, and that is the fact.

Mr. AYRES. I have also made inquiry, and I have not found anything to that effect.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYRES. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Is it not true that there are at the present moment over 600 patients in this fire trap, and would the gentleman be happy if the fire trap burned down and three or four hundred patients were burned to death?

Mr. AYRES. I do not think the gentleman is fair in asking that question.

Mr. BACON. There are over 600 patients there.

Mr. AYRES. If we are going to build a permanent hospital in Philadelphia, then why not build such hospitals at the other places where we have temporary facilities? Of course, I believe that all hospitals should be fireproof, but I must confess that I do not like the idea of waiting until our Treasury is exhausted to launch a replacement program.

I may say further that there was no recommendation on the part of the President relative to this hospital until the bill was practically completed, when all of a sudden it appeared before the committee. It seems to me to be unfair to the rest of the places that claim they should have hospitals of permanent construction. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. DARROW. Is not the gentleman in favor of economy, and by combining the Veterans' Bureau and the naval stations together we save on this one hospital over $221,000, to the better satisfaction of the veterans and all concerned? It is advocated by the Veterans' Bureau and by the Navy.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. The Veterans' Bureau did not approve of it. I will read the language of Doctor TEMPLE last year:

> Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. McCLINTIC, who has preceded me, spoke at some length of a letter from General Hines written to the chairman of the Committee on Rules. I can readily understand why General Hines, the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, would not interfere with the administration of the Navy Department by recommending the construction of a naval hospital. In fact, he himself told me that he could not do that. Having said that, I am also thoroughly convinced that he would not interfere with the department in the opposite way by recommending that a naval hospital should not be constructed.

So he did not recommend the construction of this hospital.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BECK. Mr. Chairman, I only want to testify of my own knowledge to the present condition of this hospital, which would do little credit to the smallest South American republic. It can not be compared to the hospitals, to which reference has been made, which are in a warmer climate. These flimsy, wooden, decayed structures are in a climate where the thermometer sometimes goes to zero.

I can not add anything to what my colleague, Mr. DARROW, has so ably and eloquently said, except to make a plea to the membership of this House. Philadelphia gave to the United States Government, without the expenditure of a penny, the magnificent site of the navy yard, one of the choicest sections in its future possibilities, because it is at the junction of two great rivers that flow through Philadelphia.

It is true that at any moment, while we speak, a match could set fire to these buildings and two or three hundred patients might be burned to death. I have followed the committee in most of its plans for economy, but I draw the line at this question of health and even life. I think the least we can do for the service men and the faithful employees of the Navy Yard is to build this new building, or rather commence its construction, to furnish adequate facilities to the men whose services deserve so well of their country. [Applause.]

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was up for consideration last year I opposed it on the ground that the Veterans' Bureau should be willing to provide the necessary facilities for its own patients. I am the last person who would ever raise my voice against providing hospital facilities for any class that is entitled to the same, but there should be sufficient facilities available to take care of them without using naval hospitals.

There are naval hospitals with sufficient available beds for use at the present time. Everybody knows that naval enlisted men are subject to be transferred from one place to another. Now, I want to call attention to where we are going.

In 1915 the total appropriation for naval purposes, including the amounts allocated for shipbuilding, was $172,498,000. In 1916 the total was $186,565,000. Now we are being called upon to appropriate more than $340,000,000 for next year, which means that expenditures for the upkeep of this branch of our Government has doubled, and apparently there is no desire upon the part of this House to reduce expenditures further. As long as the naval hospitals have sufficient facilities to take care of their own men, that ought to be sufficient, and further, that is the reason General Hines refused to favorably approve this particular piece of legislation when it was under consideration last year. I am in favor of some economy at some place somewhere, and I am hoping that this House will at least look at this subject from the standpoint of reason and stop wasting the taxpayers' money.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to complete this bill if it takes until 10 or 11 o'clock to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas that debate do now close.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LINTHICUM) there were—ayes 70, noes 11.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighteen Members, a quorum.

The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARROW].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. AYRES) there were—ayes 75, noes 72.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. DARROW and Mr. AYRES to act as tellers.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 62.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Naval radio and radio-compass stations: Improvement of power plant, Darien, Canal Zone, and improvement of building No. 1, Destruction Island, Wash., $40,000.

Mr. SNOW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I will say to the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES], that technically I shall speak somewhat out of order. I am anxious to leave the Chamber, and I have one or two observations to make on a paragraph of the bill that has not yet been reached. I hope no objection will be raised under the circumstances, as I shall be very brief.

An appropriation bill is solely for the purpose of appropriating money for the maintenance of the various Government departments and activities and nothing else.

Consequently, this paragraph on page 39 of the bill authorizing the President to sell, lease, or cease to operate certain naval shore properties does not belong in this bill. It is clearly an attempt to legislate and is not related to the present appropriation.

In other words, it is a subterfuge and a left-handed way of legislating. The question of closing the navy yards at New Orleans, Charleston, S. C., Boston, Mass., Kittery, Me., and various other places is a matter of grave concern.

In the name of a sensible-sized Navy, adequate to protect our country in case of war, and also in the name of thousands of employees who would be thrown out of employment in these most distressing times if this paragraph is not stricken from the bill, I ask the membership of this House to stop and ponder before voting on this critically important matter.

Perhaps there is merit in the proposal, but by all means let it be considered carefully and in an orderly legislative manner before any final action is taken here in this House of Representatives.

Let the proponents introduce a bill calling for this elimination, let it be referred to a proper committee who will have complete and full hearings, and then report to the House. We will then have the advantage of reading the hearings, obtaining the best thought of the committee members who will have given the matter careful thought and study, and will then—and not until then—be in a position to vote intelligently on the proposition.

The Clerk read as follows:

The President is authorized to sell, lease, or cease operating such naval shore property as the Secretary of the Navy may certify to him is no longer required or needed for naval purposes, and appropriations or portions of appropriations unexpended by reason of such action shall not be used for any other purposes, but shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the paragraph on the ground that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order beginning in line 9 on page 39, upon the ground that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, in order to save any controversy, I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF AERONAUTICS

AVIATION, NAVY

For aviation, as follows: For navigational, photographic, aerological, radio, and miscellaneous equipment, including repairs thereto, for use with aircraft built or building on June 30, 1932, $949,900; for maintenance, repair, and operation of aircraft factory, air stations, fleet air bases, fleet and all other aviation activities, accident prevention, testing laboratories, for overhauling of planes, and for the purchase for aviation purposes only of special clothing, wearing apparel, and special equipment, $13,578,805, including $153,000 for the equipment of vessels with catapults and including not to exceed $175,000 for the procurement of helium, and such sum shall be transferred to and made available to the Bureau of Mines on July 1, 1932; for continuing experiments and development work on all types of aircraft, including the payment of part-time or intermittent employment in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of such scientists and technicists as may be contracted for by the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, at a rate of pay not exceeding $20 per diem for any person so employed, $2,210,000; for the payment of obligations incurred under the contract authorization carried in the Navy appropriation act for the fiscal year 1932 for the production and purchase of new airplanes and their equipment, spare parts and accessories, $7,200,000; toward the construction of the rigid airships as provided in the act authorizing construction of aircraft, etc., approved June 24, 1926 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 34, sec. 749a), and subject to the contractural conditions stipulated as to such rigid airships in the act making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year 1929, $1,450,000; in all, $25,388,705; and the money herein specifically appropriated for "Aviation" shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law and shall constitute one fund: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for employees assigned to Group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the Schedule of Wages for Civil Employees in the Field Service of the Navy Department shall not exceed $1,192,145: Provided further, That in addition to the amount herein appropriated the Secretary of the Navy may, prior to July 1, 1934, enter into contracts for the production and purchase of new airplanes and their equipment, spare parts and accessories, to an amount not in excess of $5,000,000: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for maintenance of more than six heavier-than-air stations on the coast of the continental United States: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the construction of a factory for the manufacture of airplanes: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to consider, ascertain, adjust, determine, and pay out of this appropriation the amounts due on claims for damages which have occurred or may occur to private property growing out of the operations of naval aircraft, where such claim does not exceed the sum of $500.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am in sympathy with the efforts of the subcommittee to complete the reading and consideration of the pending Navy appropriation bill this afternoon, and I shall not use all the time to which I am entitled, to the end that a final vote on the pending appropriation bill may not be delayed.

Yesterday the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] referred to an hysteria of economy that was sweeping over the Nation. I think it is regrettable that this so-called economy complex, mania, hysteria, or psychological condition did not infect and dominate the American people and the Republican national administration that have been in charge of our Government for the last 11 years. If the Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover administrations had been inoculated with this economy virus we would not be facing a bankrupt Treasury. If President Hoover and his Republican predecessors had exercised a little economy and their much advertised governmental efficiency and had not lulled the American people into a fictitious prosperity and into a false sense of security, much of the evil effects of this depression could have been avoided.

The measure we are considering carries an appropriation of approximately $340,000,000 for the support of the Navy Department for the approaching fiscal year. Within the last 11 years we have appropriated $4,468,445,868 for the support of our War Department or Military Establishment, an average annual expense for military purposes of $406,222,351. In the same 11 years we appropriated $4,157,327,827 for our Navy, approximately $378,000,000 annually. In these last 11 years our combined appropriations for the War and Navy Departments aggregated $8,625,773,695, or approximately $784,000,000 annually for the support of our Army and Navy.

These enormous expenditures can only be met by laying heavy tax burdens on the backs of the American people who are already bending beneath an unbearable load. It is not my purpose at this time to analyze and discuss these appropriations for the support of our Military and Naval Establishments, further than to say that while many of the expenditures may have been justified, undoubtedly a very considerable proportion of the aggregate outlay represented an unwise and unnecessary expenditure.

The all-important issue before the American people is the reduction of taxation and expenses of Government. I have risen to suggest that a way must be found to reduce the expenses of our Government, otherwise our free institutions can not endure. In this enlightened age the people of the United States and other civilized nations should be able to formulate a policy that will relieve a tax-burdened world of the present excessive taxation for military and naval purposes. It is not to the credit of the American people or the nations overseas that they have not found a sane and sensible method of reducing our Naval and Military Establishments to the point where they will not constitute a burden on the citizenry of the great nations that control the destinies of the world.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman referred to a statement which I made yesterday.

Mr. LOZIER. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In this hysteria and mania of economy to which I referred there is not contemplated 5 cents reduction in the items to which the gentleman referred.

Mr. LOZIER. I am sure the gentleman from New York favors genuine economy and a substantial reduction in the expenses of Government. As an able and useful public servant he is no doubt convinced that prodigality or waste in expenditures of public funds can not be justified or defended. The well-being of the Nation should be our first concern.

We are drifting into a period of competitive naval construction, which will ultimately carry with it a substantial increase in the strength of our Military Establishment and in a few years double or treble our present expenditures of these two departments. In this connection may I say that if the bill granting independence to the Philippine Islands fails to become a law, and if their independence is denied or indefinitely delayed, such action on our part will make it absolutely imperative that we expend not only hundreds of millions but at least a billion dollars annually on our Navy. From a diligent study of the Philippine problem I am convinced that the permanent retention of these far-away possessions, or our exercise of sovereignty over them for 25 or 50 years, will necessitate the construction of a Navy so large and expensive as to shock the national conscience and drive our Government dangerously close to bankruptcy and economic disaster.

The forces favoring our permanent retention of the Philippines or withholding independence for an indefinite period are not asleep at the switch but are exerting every possible influence to delay and ultimately defeat the enactment of any measure designed to fulfill our national covenants and grant independence to these islands which by the fickle fortunes of war were left on our doorstep. I indulge the earnest hope that the influence of every Member of the House who recently voted for the Philippine independence measure may be exerted to the uttermost, within the limits of right and propriety, to secure favorable action in the Senate on the Hare bill providing for the withdrawal of our flag from the Orient.

We must not be drawn into a naval building contest which I believe to be inevitable unless we promptly withdraw our flag from the Philippines. By such action we will promote the interests of the American people and the welfare of our insular wards.

Now is the opportune time to withdraw our sovereignty from the Philippines. The dream of territorial expansion, the fever of national aggrandizement, the vision of gold from exploitation of Philippine resources, the piping hours of jubilee and dalliance are at an end. Prudence, reason, common sense, expediency, and sound public policy emphasize the importance of fulfilling our commitments, and withdrawing our flag from the Philippines in the immediate future.

To paraphrase the language of Horace, by withdrawing from the Philippines, thereby contributing to the creation and stabilization of the Filipino republic, we will have reared for our own people and Nation a monument more lasting than brass, more enduring than bronze or marble, more majestic than the Parthenon or Temple of Hadrian in their pristine splendor, and more regal and sublime than the ancient pyramids, which neither the wasting shower, the unavailing north wind, or an innumerable succession of years, and the flight of seasons shall be able to demolish.

Both the American and the Filipino are creatures of the same Benevolent and Infinite Father, in whose likeness and similitude each was made. The finger of Deity touched a block of Parian marble, and the American came forth. The same Omniscient Power breathed on a block of brown granite, and out of it sprang the Filipino. Each may invoke His unstinted bounty; each may claim His all-sufficient protection; each may share in the covenant of grace He gave to a misguided and self-centered world, and they may enjoy alike the birthright of freedom, and the inalienable right to work out, each his own destiny, free from the dominion or control of the other.

In meeting our obligations to withdraw from the Philippines we have experienced a flux of promises and a paucity of performance, the inevitable effect of which will be to benumb our sense of obligation and make callous and irresponsive our national conscience. It is quite evident that we have approached the Philippine problem with laggard, halting, and tardy-gaited feet. The movement for Philippine independence is flowing like a mighty river, with ever-increasing volume and momentum, toward the great ocean of realization. Not infrequently the duration of an illness is in proportion to the length of the patient's purse. And some would protract our stay in the Philippines because of the rich financial rewards that will come to a few of our people from commercial ventures in the Philippines.

Somewhere I have read of a looking-glass kept in a heathen temple that makes beautiful things appear deformed and deformed things appear beautiful. Methinks some of my colleagues, in some niche or corner of their otherwise well-balanced brains, have a mirror of this kind into which they look when considering the Philippine problem, and from which they see reflected the Filipino, of pigmy stature, grotesquely caparisoned, and wholly incapable of self-government, while in this same trick mirror they visualize "Uncle Sam" as a benevolent lord, guardian angel, and wet nurse of the Filipino people, and pretend to see the dire calamities that will overtake the native inhabitants if they are granted the poor but God-given privilege of managing their affairs, free from the guiding hand and fatherly protection of the United States Government.

Our century and a half of national life is but a moment in the tideless sweep of time. "A thousand years scarce serve to form a state; an hour may lay it in the dust." Our longevity as a nation will depend on how sacredly we hold to the high ideals on which our institutions are builded. Our Republic is not immune from the insidious process of delay, nor from the relentless forces of destruction which like rust eats its way ruthlessly through massive steel beam and column. Turn to the pages of history and learn that oblivion enshrouds not only illustrious persons but puissant nations. A Roman poet gave expression to this great truth when he said:

> The loftiest pine is oftenest agitated by the winds—high towers rush to the earth with heavier fall, and the lightning most frequently strikes the highest mountain.

And Sallust tells us:

> Everything rises but to fall, and increases but to decay.

Nations are no exception to this ruthless rule. Only by a scrupulous adherence to our national ideals can we successfully resist the insidious forces of destruction that have disintegrated world powers in the past.

It is a great thing for Americans to sit down by themselves occasionally, take stock, and learn their own shortcomings. Colton said:

> It is with nations as with individuals—those who know the least of others think the highest of themselves; for the whole family of pride and ignorance are incestuous and mutually beget each other.

Some one has said that governments of the world are like a stream that rolls under us; men are only bubbles that rise on its surface; some are brighter and larger, and sparkle longer in the sun than others; but all must break, whilst the mighty current rolls on in its wonted majesty. And friends, what are we that we should vainly boast our mastery in the science of government? What are we that we should refuse to recognize in others the aptitude for efficient self-government that we claim to possess? What assurance have we that the bubble that typifies our national life may not be punctured and collapse long before the bubble of Filipino destiny disappears in the wreck wrought by the onrushing centuries?

Ours is the most resourceful and puissant Nation on the globe; but our power, great as it may be, is not sufficient to prevent the ultimate establishment of a republic in the Philippines. In their struggle for independence, Providence is fighting on the side of the Filipinos. There is no instance in the history of the world where 13,000,000 people, as well qualified for governing themselves as the Filipinos, have ever lost their battle for independence. Sometimes destiny may travel with laggard footsteps, but ultimately he crowns with victory the efforts of every upstanding, forward-looking race to achieve independence. In the language of Morier—

The decrees of Providence are inscrutable. In spite of man's shortsighted endeavors to dispose of events according to his own wishes and his own purposes, there is an intelligence beyond his reason which holds the scales of justice in spite of his puny efforts.

And this wonder-working Providence will in the near future bring independence to the Philippines. Liberty withheld will poison the fountains of Filipino life and breed ever-increasing discontent among the inhabitants as they bite the political chains that bind them. We are not justified in longer withholding independence from the Filipinos. We should no longer stop the throats of the Filipinos who are pleading for independence and the God-given right to solve their own problems and live under laws of their own enactment.

We must once and for all time forego the exercise of sovereignty over the Philippines. We should restore the government of these islands to the race that inhabits and owns them. This act of renunciation is not incompatible with our national interests. Let us actively and unselfishly assist the Filipinos in establishing and maintaining a sister republic, motivated and inspired by the high ideals that underlie, permeate, and vitalize our free institutions, to the end that the American and Filipino Republics may go down the ages arm in arm, each a lamp and light to the other's feet. With our Republic for a pattern, and animated by our accomplishments and our high ideals in our dealings with other nations, the Filipino republic will prosper without having to fertilize her tree of liberty with the blood of her patriots. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It is getting late in the day. There is not a quorum present, and I want to call the attention of the Members of the House who are present to the fact that it would be well for them to remain if we are going to complete the bill to-day, because I intend, if I can obtain recognition, to offer a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to further consider it and report it back with a 10 per cent total reduction.

Since the Senate has indicated that it is going to follow this 10 per cent arbitrary reduction on all of the appropriation bills which we send over there, and since the chairman of our Committee on Appropriations indicates he is going to swallow those reductions without further consideration, if this reduction is to come, let it come from the House, so that when the bill is finally passed with a 10 per cent reduction we will pass it after a careful consideration of all of the items involved under the 5-minute rule. It is poor economy from the standpoint of real economy for the Committee on Appropriations of this House to hold hearings and spend hours and days considering a very voluminous bill of this nature, involving so much money, and then have the membership remain on the floor of the House, as we have to-day, carefully going over each and every item under the 5-minute rule, and send the bill to the Senate to be arbitrarily reduced 10 per cent, without a record roll-call vote on many important appropriations, and then expect the House of Representatives to rubber stamp the Senate amendments under suspension of the rules, with only 40 minutes' consideration.

If the arbitrary additional reduction is to be made in order to enhance the political standing of some who would destroy some of the essential functions of the Government by a false and fake economy, and since the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations indicates he will support the 10 per cent reduction if it is incorporated in this bill in the Senate and swallow it as he did the 10 per cent reduction on the Interior Department appropriation bill, let us, in the name of orderly procedure, in keeping with the authority and responsibility vested in us under the Constitution, take our part in the enactment of this appropriation bill.

Mr. BYRNS. If the gentleman has reached the end of his sentence, I would like to ask him to yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. I yield.

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman had something to say about my position as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, with reference, I assume, to the action taken with reference to the Interior Department appropriation bill. I just want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that on a record vote this House approved that action by a vote of 263 to 42.

Mr. SCHAFER. I did not approve of that action then and I do not now. I have also talked with many Members who followed the gentleman from Tennessee who would not do it again. If the gentleman would have made his eloquent political speech in the name of economy and asked the House to vote that the sun shall rise at 7 o'clock a. m. each day in the future and that the moon shall rise at 7 o'clock p. m. each evening; if one of the many Senate amendments to the Interior appropriations bill so provided, no doubt the roll call would have been the same. You might fool some of the people some of the time, but you can not all of the time.

If you could take that roll-call vote over again to-day, I know you would not even get a majority to follow the strange and unusual procedure.

Mr. BYRNS. If the gentleman has reached the end of his second sentence, I would like to ask him another question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. BYRNS. If the gentleman would practice a little more economy, he would represent the taxpayers of his district. I am sure that his district, like my district and every other district in the United States, wants to see these expenditures cut down.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Objection was made.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVAL ACADEMY

Pay, Naval Academy—pay for professors and others, Naval Academy: Pay of professors and instructors, including one professor as librarian, $269,000: Provided, That not more than $36,500 shall be paid for masters and instructors in swordsmanship and physical training.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of bringing a situation to the attention of the chairman of the subcommittee. I find that the military appropriation bill provides $46,561, as is found on page 21 of the appropriation bill, for the payment of salaries of professors in the Military Academy. Then on page 18 of last year's naval appropriation bill I find that the sum was $290,000. In view of the fact that the Military Academy takes care of two appointees for each Senator and each Member of the House, and the Naval Academy takes care of only three, I can not understand why it is necessary to appropriate $290,000 to take care of teachers in one of these institutions and only $46,000 in the other. I respectfully ask somebody to tell us why these inequalities seem to exist.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Was the gentleman reading from this year's Army appropriation bill or last year's Army appropriation bill?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I am reading from last year's Army appropriation bill. I understand that both of these bills have been reduced in a slight percentage, but the ratio remains the same. It does seem to me that if we are interested in economy, and we base this upon the number of appointees that the House Members have, there is something radically wrong, and I would like some one who has the facts to give them to the committee.

Mr. AYRES. I will state to the gentleman that I can not speak as to the West Point proposition.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I will be glad to get information from some one.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does not the difference arise from the fact that at the Military Academy they employ officers who are assigned to duty as teachers and instructors rather than employing civilian teachers and instructors?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I do not know how far the gentleman's statement is accurate, but I do know that in the Naval Academy they possibly employ as many officers as they do in the Military Academy.

Mr. TABER. If the gentleman will yield, they have more at the Naval Academy.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. I think they have about eight civilian instructors at West Point and the rest are Army officers.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Can the gentleman enlighten the committee as to why this enormous inconsistency exists with respect to the appropriations that are made to take care of teachers in both of these institutions?

Mr. BARBOUR. I am not familiar with the situation at the Naval Academy, but I understand they employ a great many more civilians there.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. It seems to me the committee ought to be furnished with the facts. It seems to me somebody ought to know just why this inconsistency exists.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Last March, after the adjournment of Congress, as a member of the Board of Visitors, that question arose, and it was called to our attention that at the Naval Academy they have many more civilian instructors than they have at the Military Academy.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. On that point I want to say that the appropriation for civilian employees at the Naval Academy is $649,000 against the sum of $276,000 at the Military Academy.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. If these figures are correct then approximately three times more is necessary to take care of the civilian employees at Annapolis than at the Military Academy.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will yield further, there are stationed at the Military Academy two troops of enlisted men, and they perform services that are performed by civilians at the Naval Academy.

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. COLLINS. There are about 450 civilians at the Military Academy and between 1,100 and 1,200 soldiers at the Military Academy besides the officers.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to say that upon a very thorough investigation at the Military Academy, in company with the gentleman from South Carolina, our esteemed chairman of the committee [Mr. McSWAIN], the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Goss], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COCHRAN], we saw no surplusage as far as civilian employees were concerned.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I have no criticism to offer of the appropriation made to take care of these duties at the Military Academy, but I can not understand why it requires nearly three times as much to take care of the same number of employees at Annapolis.

Mr. FISH. Why does it?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I would like to know.

Mr. FISH. Who is going to answer?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I do not know. I have asked the chairman of the subcommittee and the different members of the committee, but up to the present time I have not been able to get any information.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I will be pleased to yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. The reason these figures appear to give the Naval Academy all the worst of it is because the Naval Academy employs a great many less officers of the line of the Navy as instructors than West Point for its languages and higher studies——

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I think the gentleman is in error. I now yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BRITTEN. Let me finish my statement. With respect to some of the higher studies we use nothing but civilian instructors at the Naval Academy, while the Military Academy at West Point does not have this expense at all. If the gentleman will add the civilian instructors to the officer instructors at both institutions, he will find there are fewer instructors per student at the Naval Academy to-day than there are at West Point. I am sure about this.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I think the gentleman is in error. I think there are many more instructors, taking into consideration the number of men that are employed as swordsmen, tutors, athletic directors, and various kinds of assistants.

Mr. BRITTEN. I have just inquired of the Navy Department, and that is the reason I am answering the gentleman in this way.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma: Page 42, line 1, after the word "librarian," strike out "$269,000" and insert "$200,000."

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, it is evident that we will be unable to finish the consideration of the bill this evening. I move, therefore, that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FULLER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 11452, the Navy Department appropriation bill, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. MAY (at the request of Mr. THOMASON), for the balance of the week, on account of important business.

Mrs. OWEN, for one week, on account of important business.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
STATE OF MAINE,
Augusta, April 19, 1932.

To the honorable the SPEAKER OF HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: In accordance with the provisions of the attached resolution of the Legislature of the State of Maine, I have the honor to forward you herewith a certified and fully authenticated copy of a resolution titled as follows:

"A resolve ratifying proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress, and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress."

The same was adopted by the Legislature of the State of Maine on April 1, A. D. 1932.

Respectfully,

EDGAR C. SMITH, Secretary of State.

INSURANCE CORPORATIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following concurrent resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 26

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3584) entitled "An act to require all insurance corporations formed under the provisions of Chapter XVIII of the Code of Laws of the District of Columbia to maintain their principal offices and places of business within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia has no objection to this resolution.

Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

There was no objection.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

SOLDIERS' ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert the following speech by myself on the subject of the bonus:

SPEECH OF HON. HAMILTON FISH, JR., IN RADIO DEBATE WITH HON. WRIGHT PATMAN, TUESDAY EVENING, APRIL 19, 1932

I am glad of this opportunity to discuss over the radio with my good friend, colleague, and comrade in arms, WRIGHT PATMAN, in a calm and deliberate manner, without prejudice of any kind, the already much and hotly debated question of the so-called bonus payment to the veterans of the World War.

For some 12 years past as a Member of the House of Representatives I have raised my voice and given my vote freely and openly for the benefit of the disabled veterans and of all other veterans. I was among the first to urge the creation of a Veterans' Legislative Committee in the House of Representatives and participated to the best of my ability in the original fight for adjusted compensation for the veterans, and I even voted to override the veto of a President of my own party, and only last year urged the payment of loans up to 50 per cent on the face value of the adjusted-service certificates.

I need no alibi or no defense of my record in behalf of justice, not charity, to the veterans and for all kinds of beneficial legislation sought by the three great veterans' organizations, the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the Disabled American Veterans, the first two of which I am proud to be a member.

There is room for differences of opinion among veterans, and it is just and right that there should be, as the veterans merely represent a cross section of the American people who served in the armed forces of the United States in a great national emergency.

I am not unmindful of the suffering and privation among the unemployed veterans and believe that preference should be given them in obtaining positions and that the comprehensive and constructive campaign or drive of the American Legion and the Disabled American Veterans to provide work and jobs should be encouraged and supported in every way by the American public.

The veterans want jobs, not charity or doles, and I will gladly support a bond issue of $500,000,000 to provide for needed highway construction, the completion of the Federal program for post offices already allocated but not appropriated for, and for other necessary public works, with a proviso that unemployed veterans be given preference on all new construction work.

It is estimated that appropriations for the fiscal year of 1932 will approximate $1,127,935,000 for veterans' relief purposes, or over $3,000,000 a day, or more than 25 per cent of our total Federal expenditures, including debt charges of $600,000,000. Veterans' relief is by far the largest single item in our Budget, and if national defense and interest on debts are excluded, it amounts to 40 per cent of all our Federal Government expenditures.

No sane person can deny that the Government has been extremely liberal, generous, and fair in its treatment of its veterans, particularly when compared with what other countries, such as England, France, or Italy, have done for their soldiers.

It is true that we are in an economic crisis far more serious to the welfare, interests, happiness, and security of the American people than during the World War. Uncle Sam has always fulfilled every obligation to its veterans of all its wars, and has never given a bad check and never will. If it were a fact that the Federal Government owes any money to the veterans, ways and means should be found to pay it now. Obligations of the Government must be paid in full in both good and bad times. Promises and pledges must be kept to veterans as well as to all other citizens.

I, however, deny most emphatically that the Federal Government owes one red cent to any veteran at this time, either directly or indirectly, or has made any implied promise to pay in cash any part of the adjusted-service certificates this year, next year, or any time before 1945. For some incomprehensible reason many misguided veterans take it for granted and firmly believe that they are owed a debt by the Government, which they seem to think has turned a cold shoulder to them and refuses to pay what is their due.

It is utterly inconceivable that the Congress will approve the various suggestions made to start the printing presses going and issue depreciated currency to pay in cash the adjusted-service certificates during the present economic emergency. Such action by Congress would seriously affect every American household and impair the value of wages, real estate, insurance policies, bonds and other securities, and deposits in savings banks belonging to industrious and thrifty American wage earners. Any tampering with the American dollar, which is the only thing left that retains its value, by issuing two billions in paper currency will be injurious to the public credit and destructive of what remains of economic confidence, and will prolong both the depression and unemployment.

It is, in the last analysis, the same old fight of soft money against sound money. We are already in the midst of a severe panic, but if the proposed financial heresy of printing two more billions of paper money is carried out it will mean the collapse of the dollar and American credit that will make the present panic look like a new-born babe.

The proposal to pay adjusted-service certificates in United States bank notes, as suggested by Representative PATMAN, backed by 40 per cent gold, would exhaust our gold reserves, cause the flight of gold to France and other foreign countries, and probably shove us off the gold standard within six months, and be detrimental to the welfare of the Nation and ruinous to credit stability.

It is the paramount duty of the Congress of the United States to maintain the credit of the Nation, balance the Budget, and reduce governmental expenditures and thereby restore economic faith among our people, without which the depression will become worse and unemployment increase.

I appeal to all veterans not to insist on extravagant demands upon the Public Treasury at this time, when the Congress is struggling to balance the Budget and restore economic confidence. I take this occasion to seriously warn all veterans that their demand for additional compensation to the able-bodied veterans during the present crisis is causing serious public resentment and will jeopardize the benefits provided by law for the disabled veterans and the passage of the pending legislation for widows and orphans. A definite movement is under way to reduce the amount of relief already provided by Congress for the disabled veterans in a desperate effort to balance the Budget, and it is a most unwise policy for any group of veterans to alienate the support of the public by tremendous demands for cash payments to the able-bodied veterans at this time. The taxpayers throughout the Nation are on the verge of a political revolt; and while they do not begrudge the disabled veterans their just dues, they are opposed to further drains on the Treasury for any group or any section of the country.

It is not easy for me to oppose any claims of the veterans for monetary relief in this period of unemployment and distress, yet, believing firmly as I do, that any attempt to pay $2,400,000,000 to the veterans would undo all the efforts of the Government to balance the Budget and scrap all ideas of governmental economy, and be harmful to our financial credit at home and abroad and destructive of the economic welfare of the great mass of American wage earners, there is no other course for me to take except to uphold, without fear or favor, what I honestly deem to be the best interests of all the American people in preserving the integrity of the gold standard and preventing the issue of depreciated currency as a temporary expedient, which will bring ruin and disaster in its wake, as it has done in Russia and Germany and in every other country where it has been tried since the French Revolution, 140 years ago, when worthless paper currency, known to history as "assignats," were issued in vast quantities. I know of no more dangerous precedent to establish than to start the printing presses going and issue several billions of dollars to the veterans or any other group among the American people, whether they be farmers who are burdened with debts or factory workers who are unemployed.

Once Congress starts in, by a mere majority vote, to change the value of money under political pressure, whether of the veterans or any other group, it will be the beginning of the end of American currency. The value of the dollar might drop to 50 cents or even 30 cents if we go off the gold standard. If Congress starts in trying to manipulate the dollar, or pay obligations of the Government through paper currency, it may mean not only severe depreciation of our money but that it is headed for destruction.

There is no more valid reason to print two billions of new currency for the able-bodied veterans than to balance the Budget by new note issues. Why spend months haggling over various kinds of new taxes, when all that is necessary is to buy a few gallons of oil and a few bales of bank-note paper and print sufficient paper currency? What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. Why argue over a program of national economy and reduction of wages; it is much easier to rely on the printing presses. Why worry over an expensive road construction and public-building program when new bank notes can be issued into the billions?

Why strive over the cost of national defense and talk of reducing the Army and Navy and closing the navy yards? Why not solve all the problems of the farmers by issuing nine billions in paper currency as suggested by one of their ultraradical organizations? There is no end to the absurdity of issuing fiat money. It is always the last resort of bankrupt nations and has never failed to end in a financial and economic catastrophe. Instead of reviving business it would produce runs on banks, as everyone would want gold instead of fiat money or congressional or political bank notes. I know of nothing that would prostrate business quicker or more surely.

At my request, the Veterans' Administration furnished me to-day with the following astounding data relative to the number of veterans of the World War who are receiving every month monetary relief from the Treasury of the United States. The sums received by the veterans range from $8 to $100, except for special awards to the blinded, amounting to $150, and to the doubled permanently disabled, amounting to $200. There are to-day 322,825 World War veterans receiving disability compensation and 353,744 receiving disability allowance for injuries or diseases that have no connection with war service.

There are also 6,451 disabled emergency officers receiving retirement pay, of which 25 per cent are doctors. In addition, 98,401 dependents of World War veterans, making a total of 781,421 World War veterans and dependents of veterans receiving financial relief from the Government of the United States.

There has been much loose talk over the vote of Congress to set up the Reconstruction Finance Corporation with a $2,000,000,000 credit in order, in this emergency, to make loans to banks, railroads, building and loan associations, and certain farm cooperatives. In the first place, the Congress is not giving away anything; it is merely proposing to extend credit and loans on adequate security, primarily to small banks, on behalf of the small-town grocer, butcher, dairyman, or farmer. Few, if any, of the big banks have failed or are in financial trouble. The record of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shows that it has extended loans as of April 19, 1932, to 1,520 banks. Ninety-two per cent of these loans have been made in cities of less than 100,000 population and 76 per cent in cities of less than 10,000.

There is no chance whatever of the adjusted-service certificate bill becoming law over the President's veto. In my opinion, the bill will not receive a majority in Congress, nor a majority of the veterans in Congress.

It is, however, true that there are great numbers of unemployed veterans, and much hardship and suffering among them, and it is most unjust to attempt to deceive them by holding out the hope of cash payments at this time.

I am in favor of reducing the interest on the adjusted-service certificates to 3 per cent and have introduced a bill to this effect.

No Member of Congress can vote to expend public funds to the amount of $2,400,000,000 to able-bodied veterans and at the same time represent to his people back home that he has carried out their demands for governmental economy. The veterans should not in this emergency expect individual Members of Congress who have the interest of the veterans and the public at heart to vote for any governmental expenditures that are not due or absolutely necessary.

Those Members of Congress who for selfish, political purposes propose to vote for the so-called bonus and then, if the bill passes, do an about-face and uphold the President's assured veto will be doing a cowardly political act and a distinct disservice to the veterans by holding out false hopes for cash payments, when none exist, during the present economic crisis and national emergency.

We are already confronted with a deficit of nearly $3,000,000,000 and with steadily decreasing Federal income. At this very moment we are faced with the difficulty of finding new sources of revenue, and it may be necessary to reduce the salaries of men and women in the employ of the Government. No individual has ever found a way of pulling himself up by the bootstraps, nor has any nation overcome depression by printing vast quantities of paper money without strangling public credit and confidence and within a short time creating a vicious financial and monetary circle that wrecks trade and commerce, with disastrous consequence to the rich and poor alike, thereby increasing human misery and distress and adding more unfortunates to the already huge number of unemployed.

The main reason I oppose the payment of $2,400,000,000 in unsupported paper currency to the veterans at this time is my firm conviction that it would cause runs on banks, destroy faith in our financial system, and virtually bankrupt the credit of the Federal Government.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that next Calendar Wednesday business be made in order on Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

DEATH OF JOSEPH WARREN KEIFER

Mr. BRAND of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I regret to inform the House of the death of J. Warren Keifer at Springfield, Ohio, on this morning. He was 96 years of age. He was formerly a Speaker of this House, just 50 years ago, in the Forty-seventh Congress. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the following minute be spread upon the record of the House of Representatives:

Hon. Joseph Warren Keifer died in Springfield, Ohio, April 22, 1932. On January 30, 1932, he reached the venerable age of 96 years. For seven terms he was a Member of this House; for one term (the Forty-seventh Congress) its Speaker. His services terminated with the Sixty-first Congress. He was a brave and distinguished soldier. For "gallant and meritorious service" in the Civil War he was made a brigadier general, and in the same war, having been wounded four times in battle, was made a major general of volunteers. In the Spanish-American War he was commissioned and served as a major general of volunteers side by side with Gen. Joe Wheeler and Gen. Fitzhugh Lee. He was a statesman, a scholar, an author, and a patriot. His nearly five score years of life were filled with useful deeds of kindness, of courage, and of fidelity to his country and to his fellow men, and he has passed into history honored and beloved.

Resolved, That in honor of the distinguished dead the House do now adjourn.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I know of no precedent for adjournment on account of the death of an ex-Member.

Mr. BRAND of Ohio. I am informed by the former Clerk of the House that there are several precedents.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not informed, but understands that similar resolutions have been passed by the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Keifer having been an ex-Speaker of the House, I withdraw the objection.

ADJOURNMENT

The resolution was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.), in pursuance to the resolution, the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, April 23, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

534. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report dated April 20, 1932, from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on preliminary examination and survey of the harbor at Grand Marais, Minn.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

535. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report dated April 19, 1932, from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, on preliminary examination and survey of Great Sodus Bay Harbor, N. Y.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

SENATE

SATURDAY, APRIL 23, 1932

(Legislative day of Friday, April 22, 1932)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had concurred in the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 26) requesting the President of the United States to return to the Senate the enrolled bill (S. 3584) entitled "An act to require all insurance corporations formed under the provisions of Chapter XVIII of the Code of Law of the District of Columbia to maintain their principal offices and places of business within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

FINANCING OF CRIME

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I notice in the morning paper an astonishing statement that Al Capone has again offered to assist in recovering the Lindbergh baby and has actually offered an absolute guarantee that if he is permitted temporarily to leave his sojourn in the Federal penitentiary he will see that the baby is returned within a very few days. His friend has assured Colonel Lindbergh that the return of the baby will be made without the payment of a cent in ransom in addition to that which has already been paid.

Mr. President, this is the second time it has occurred that Al Capone has offered to return the baby if he could get out of jail for a while. Furthermore, the Lindbergh family have been in touch with two of the leading gangsters in New York in an effort to get the baby back. The fact that the Federal and local officials have been baffled for weeks and that it has been necessary to turn to the gangsters and that their leader, who made his money chiefly from the beer racket and from bootleggers, is willing to stake his reputation by guaranteeing that the baby can be returned lends some force to the claim which has frequently been made to me by various people that the kidnaping was done by a friend of Capone for this very purpose.

Furthermore, people have been writing to me from various parts of the country saying that they agree with the resolution adopted by the Los Angeles Aviators' Post of the American Legion, which blames the prohibition laws for the gangsters' activities. Essentially the resolution states that it is their belief that these organized criminal activities have been created and are fostered by the continuance of our existing national prohibition laws which have made enormous profits available for such antisocial groups. I have received letters from various persons in widely separated parts of the United States who tell me that circumstances connected with the kidnaping of the Lindbergh baby have convinced them that the adoption of the eighteenth amendment was a mistake and that it should be repealed. In one letter the father of a family of five children stated that he and his neighbors had until recently been ardent advocates of the eighteenth amendment, but that now they are convinced that it should be repealed.

The crime of kidnaping is not a new crime, and I do not believe that it has been caused by prohibition. At the same time it must be obvious to everyone that the successful financing of crime on a large scale has unquestionably been due to the enormous profits of the bootleggers. The Government has lost hundreds of millions of dollars in revenue which has gone into the bootleggers' pockets as profits. These profits have enabled them to finance crime on a hitherto unparalleled scale.

Although I can not agree fully with my various correspondents who blame the kidnaping of the Lindbergh baby entirely on the prohibition laws, I have the greatest sympathy with the position which they have taken, and I do feel that the time has come for the Congress to face the fact called attention to by the Los Angeles aviators, that our existing national prohibition laws have made enormous profits available to gangsters and racketeers. The sooner we repeal the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act and permit each State to pass the kind of prohibition law desired by the majority of its citizens the sooner will we diminish the enormous profits which are now going into the pockets of criminals and helping them to carry out difficult crimes successfully.

I send to the desk the resolution of the Los Angeles Aviators' Post of the American Legion to which I have referred and ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas, apparently as the direct result of a dangerous new development of gangster and racketeer activities in this Nation, there has recently been perpetrated a peculiarly heinous crime, to wit, the kidnaping of the infant son of a nationally honored and beloved hero, Col. Charles A. Lindbergh; and

Whereas under stress of the great anxiety occasioned by the said crime Colonel Lindbergh has apparently deemed it necessary to carry on negotiations for the recovery of his child with reputed notorious gangster, racketeer, and other so-called underworld characters rather than depending solely upon the lawfully constituted authorities of his State and of the Federal Government; and

Whereas the perpetration of such a crime and the most regrettable means considered necessary for its solution are both indications of how seriously gangster and racketeer activities have fastened themselves upon the life of the Nation; and

Whereas, in our opinion, such organized criminal activities have been created by and are fostered by the continuance of our existing national prohibition laws, which have made enormous profits available to such antisocial groups: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Aviators' Post, No. 350, of the American Legion, Department of California, petition our Senators and Representatives in Congress to give earnest consideration to such lawful measures as may secure changes in the existing prohibition statutes which will remove the primary cause of the dangerous gangster and racketeer organizations of the country.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. VANDENBERG presented a resolution adopted by the Common Council of the City of Detroit, Mich., inviting attention to the naval appropriation bill and favoring the appropriation of sufficient funds therein to enable the Federal Government continue its share of the expense of the Naval Reserve, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ASHURST presented a telegram, in the nature of a memorial, from the Phoenix (Ariz.) Clearing House Association, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Norbeck bill, being the bill (S. 4291) to amend section 5219 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Pima County, Ariz., remonstrating against proposed reductions in the compensation of Federal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented telegrams, in the nature of memorials, from Fred W. Moore, president of the Chamber of Commerce of Flagstaff and the Chamber of Commerce of Winslow, both in the State of Arizona, remonstrating against proposed reductions in the compensation of Federal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a telegram from sundry letter carriers of New Orleans, La., congratulating the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] on his stand opposing Federal salary reductions, and stating in part, "Industries are just waiting for this opportunity to cut salaries. This will not only demoralize but will lower living standards. Spending power should not be lowered," which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BARBOUR presented a resolution adopted by the Frank J. Bartletta Association, of Hoboken, N. J., protesting against proposed reductions in the compensation of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Cold Spring Grange, No. 132, Patrons of Husbandry, of Cold Spring, Cape May County, N. J., remonstrating against the imposition of taxes on automobiles and the automobile industry, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Albert L. Quinn Post, No. 52, American Legion, Department of New Jersey, urging the national commander of the American Legion to convene the executive committee of the Legion in special session for the purpose of rescinding the previous action taken on the cash-payment question (bonus) at Detroit, Mich., and at such session to arrange for a poll of the Legion membership on the question, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Atlantic City, N. J., protesting against the passage of legislation to pay adjusted-compensation certificates of World War veterans (bonus) at the present time, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

APPROPRIATION FOR ERADICATION OF GRASSHOPPER PLAGUE

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, on yesterday I served notice that on Monday in the morning hour I would press for consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 149, providing for lifting the appropriation for grasshopper eradication out of the agricultural appropriation bill, now in conference, unless it appears at that time that that bill will be here for final passage at that time.

To show the urgency of this appropriation I ask to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a telegram received by me this morning from the State entomologist of Minnesota.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. PAUL, MINN., April 23, 1932.

Senator HENRIK SHIPSTEAD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Latest time mash application varies middle May to last of June. Appropriation delay results poor organization for handling bait, due to rules of bidding and shortage bran. Great doubt now that can be secured on time in sufficient quantities. Mash must be in counties May 15. Hopper eggs wintered perfectly. Situation serious.

A. G. RUGGLES.

PAYMENT OF SOLDIERS' BONUS

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I ask permission to have incorporated in the RECORD and appropriately referred a telegram received from a number of business men of Valparaiso, Ind., favoring immediate payment of the soldiers' bonus.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VALPARAISO, IND., April 22, 1932.

Senator ARTHUR ROBINSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned business men of Valparaiso, Ind., having given the matter serious consideration, advise you that notwithstanding Mr. Dawes's profanity, we favor the payment of the soldiers' bonus bill with greenbacks based on the 40 per cent gold guaranty as outlined by Senator CAPPER and Representative PATMAN. The deflation, unless checked, will bankrupt 90 per cent of the business men and farmers in our district.

PROPOSED REDUCTION OF FEDERAL SALARIES

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, also I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a resolution of Federal Post, No. 62, the American Legion, of Indianapolis, Ind., protesting against contemplated salary reductions.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas certain bills have been introduced in the present Congress contemplating the reduction of salaries of Federal employees; and

Whereas the present economic condition has had a telling effect on the families of Federal employees, in some cases due to relatives of said employees being forced into a state of dependency by the said present economic conditions; and

Whereas the Federal employees have donated to charity institutions and relief organizations in amounts heretofore unknown to be given by men drawing like salaries; and

Whereas Federal employees have worked for a very small salary while others in the industrial service were receiving high wages, the lowest being about double the amount paid Federal employees; and

Whereas such reductions in salaries will decrease the buying power of the Nation and thereby prolong the present economic conditions: Therefore be it

Resolved, That Federal Post, No. 62, the American Legion, Department of Indiana, memorialize the national headquarters of the American Legion to protest against such contemplated salary reductions; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the national commander of the American Legion, the national legislative committee, and all Senators and Representatives from Indiana.

FEDERAL POST, NO. 62, THE AMERICAN LEGION, DEPARTMENT OF INDIANA,
By L. E. ZINKAN, Adjutant.

PROPOSED TAX ON SALES OF SECURITIES

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, also I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD, without the signatures, and appropriately referred a memorial numerously signed by citizens of Terre Haute and vicinity, in my State, remonstrating against the proposed tax on sales of securities.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, without the signatures, as follows:

Hon. Senator ARTHUR R. ROBINSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The revenue bill in its present form, providing for a tax of one-quarter of 1 per cent on the sale of securities and a 5-cent tax on each hundred dollars value of commodities traded in on futures markets, will not produce the revenue which is now anticipated. The fact is that the cost to the investors in stocks and commodities will be so prohibitive that they will of necessity seek other forms of investment. This will dry up the markets, and trading of this character will be reduced to a small fraction of its present volume, thereby defeating the purpose of the tax and eventually greatly increasing our taxes on other necessities. In addition to this, many banking institutions, financial houses, and brokerage firms will find it necessary to reduce expenses by force reduction, which in no wise will help our present economic situation.

We, the undersigned, most drastically oppose the passage of the revenue bill, which is now before the Finance Committee of the United States Senate, especially in so far as same pertains to the further taxation of one-quarter of 1 per cent on securities and 5 cents on every $100 traded on in the commodities markets. It is our earnest belief that such taxation, if permitted to become a law, will undoubtedly be the means of driving out of the securities and commodities markets the speculative and investment interests so necessary to maintain an equitable basis for such markets. Taxation already imposed is sufficient without adding any further burden and tending to destroy the markets of the farmers and industries. We urge that you do everything in your power to bring about the defeat of this proposed legislation.

WILLIAM L. HINDS

MINNESOTA SENATORIAL CONTEST

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Le Sueur

News-Herald, of the 20th instant, published at Le Sueur, in my State.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and it is as follows:

Hoidale has filed his papers in an effort to unseat Senator SCHALL. He charges irregularities in certain precincts. If there were irregularities, perhaps they should have been hung on Hoidale. Perhaps Hoidale is above suspicion, and perhaps not. Hoidale says SCHALL violated the postal laws by sending out political matter under his "frank." The United States Post Office Department says Senator SCHALL was within his rights. The department ought to know. Hoidale charges that Senator SCHALL was elected by "illegal methods and by fraud." It is possible the court may hang something on Hoidale that will make him feel about as he did when he made the speech thanking the voters for electing him United States Senator. It is quite evident, however, that Mr. Hoidale is bringing the contest for the sole purpose of "gathering in" the cash allowance made and provided for such cases. Remember Magnus Johnson received quite a sum in a similar proceeding, so the story goes.

REPORTS OF THE MILITARY AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3577) for the relief of Rolando B. Moffett, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 591) thereon.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4190) for the relief of Thomas E. Reed, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 592) thereon.

Mr. DICKINSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1029) for the relief of Basil N. Henry, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 593) thereon.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF THE POST OFFICE COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably sundry nominations of postmasters, which were placed on the Executive Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LOGAN:

A bill (S. 4462) to accelerate public construction in periods of business depression through the creation of an Administration of Public Works and to provide for a more effective coordination and correlation of the public-works functions of the Government, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. SCHALL:

A bill (S. 4470) granting a pension to Henry Berndt; and

A bill (S. 4471) granting a pension to Elsie D. Cole; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. NYE:

A bill (S. 4472) to provide for the restoration, through exchange, of certain timberlands to the Yosemite National Park, Calif., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

By Mr. NORBECK:

A bill (S. 4473) to amend section 19 of the Federal reserve act, as amended; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

AIR MAIL SERVICES IN THE ORIENT

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I ask that there may be printed in the RECORD a letter which I have received from the Department of Commerce, Assistant Secretary for Aeronautics, on the importance of American participation in air mail services in the Orient.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
ASSISTANT SECRETARY FOR AERONAUTICS,
Washington, April 21, 1932.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR ODDIE: I am inclosing a copy of a memorandum on the subject of Encouragement to American Participation in Air Mail Services in the Far East, at the request of Mr. Julean Arnold, the American commercial attaché at Shanghai, China. This memorandum is a copy of one being transmitted by the American Chamber of Commerce of Shanghai to the United States Chamber of Commerce for consideration at its annual meeting on May 16–20 at San Francisco.

It will interest you to know that the German group, who represent in China the Lufthansa Co., of Berlin, which is establishing a line between China and Germany, has made an offer to the Chinese Government to take over the Sino-American contract and to finance the losses accruing to the Chinese Government in connection with the operations of this agreement. It is understood that the Lufthansa Co. will agree to advance 90 per cent of the money needed to establish a factory in China for the manufacture of aviation equipment, thereby frustrating American efforts to conclude a contract with the Chinese on this subject. It appears that the German interests are not lacking in funds. The Lufthansa Co. is subsidized by the German Government.

If there is any further information with regard to this subject which you might desire to have, please let us know.

Sincerely yours,

CLARENCE M. YOUNG,
Assistant Secretary of Commerce.

[Inclosure]

ENCOURAGEMENT TO AMERICAN PARTICIPATION IN AIR MAIL SERVICES IN THE FAR EAST

China possesses unusually alluring potentialities in commercial aviation owing to (a) its vast area, (b) its enormous population, and (c) its lamentable backwardness in the development of railways and motor roads. China's population is densely congested in certain areas, making it possible to reach enormous numbers of people over comparatively short distances in flying.

To realize upon the potentialities in the purchasing power of the masses in China, one of the outstanding essentials is modern means of communications. Through better internal transportation economic conditions will be improved gradually, adding to the purchasing power of these naturally industrious people.

To construct China's necessary trunk railway lines will require enormous outlays of capital and much time. The Chinese people are becoming road minded. Air mail and passenger services accentuate the needs for and advantages of motor transportation. Commercial aviation at comparatively small capital outlays can be speedily installed to connect up the centers of population throughout the vast area comprising China. For instance, a line now operating between Shanghai and Chungking, 1,100 miles by air, delivers mail to the commercial capital of a Province of upward of 50,000,000 people in two days. Prior to the inauguration of this service the average time required for mail from Shanghai to Chungking, 1,400 miles by water, was two weeks. It was estimated that the average time for a letter to make the round trip from Shanghai to Chungking was from five to six weeks. Now, with the air mail service, the average round-trip time is five or six days. It is interesting to note that this service from Hankow to Chungking, where there is a crying need for expeditious transportation, actually pays its way, leading to the assumption that when other equally strategic lines are under operation it will be possible to make at least several of them profitable ventures from the very inception of the services.

American capital and initiative are pioneering commercial aviation in China. In financial cooperation with the Chinese Government they have, for the present at least, a virtual monopoly of Chinese domestic air transport. This will be of great advantage if it can be maintained over the present period of great and unexpected difficulties. They have had to meet numerous obstacles and handicaps, many of which were quite unforeseen. Probably the most serious of these handicaps are the financial drains on the central government treasury due to civil wars, the disastrous Yangtze floods, and the demands arising from the Japanese aggression. Thus the American group operating as the China Airways, Federal (Inc.), United States of America, finds it difficult to tide over the financial demands during this period of pioneering development, especially so considering the inability of the Chinese Government to raise the revenues required for air mail subsidy, without which no air transport line in the world to-day could continue operating without loss.

This situation is now threatened because a German corporation, which is developing a line through China to connect with Europe, is heavily subsidized, and on account of this fact is able to offer more alluring financial terms to the Chinese Government than can the American corporation, which must depend entirely upon private capital. Unless the American corporation is able to secure assistance from our Government, we may expect to find that the German-subsidized line will be able to present such favorable financial proposals to the Chinese Government as to force the Americans to retire from the field. In this connection it must be borne in mind that the Sino-American line is operating with American pilots and American equipment and considerable American personnel otherwise. It is a very significant fact, for it means that the American pilots are American trade scouts. The American planes advertise American materials and lead to the use of American air equipment as well as other American products in China. Furthermore, Chinese trained in the Sino-American company become accustomed to the use of American equipment, American ideas, and American materials, and unconsciously sell America to China.

The American plan for far-eastern aviation contemplates the pick-up and put-down of American air mail in Yokohama and the similar pick-up and put-down in Manila, with a general distribution throughout China. This plan would speed the round trip of a letter from Shanghai to Yokohama or to Manila by a week and from Manila to the United States by two weeks. Thus the development of internal air lines under American auspices will make for an advantageous distribution throughout China, for contact with the Philippine Islands, with Hawaii, and with prospective trans-Pacific air services.

If the China services are operated under German auspices, little or no cognizance will be taken of the needs of improving communications with the United States. German control would naturally prevent this, since their full energy would be devoted to establishing trade channels in the other direction. The German line, operating through China across central Asia and into Europe, will speed up mail service between Europe and China, thereby further handicapping American trade, unless America is able to develop equally expeditious mail contacts with China. Furthermore, the materials, methods, and ideas will be German and the future of aviation development in China will be of German rather than of American character. The effect on general business will be of German complexion rather than an American.

Hence by supporting the Sino-American aviation developments in China and making them effective services in internal communications we prepare the way for successful and profitable contacts by air between China and other Pacific regions, and more especially with the objective in view of connecting United States and China by regular air services.

At present an air mail line runs from Miami, Fla., to the West Indies, to Central America, and to South America. This line touches roughly about a hundred and twenty million people and a volume of American business approximately equal to American business in the Far East. The United States Post Office Department subsidizes this line to the extent of $6,500,000 to $7,000,000 gold annually. If the Post Office Department will subsidize the activities of the far-eastern service above referred to to the extent of $1,000,000 gold annually, about 300,000,000 people of great potential buying power can be touched.

Our Government has deemed it worth while to subsidize the American lines connecting up with South America with large annual contributions, yet the entire population of all of South America is but a fraction of that of China while the total volume of trade between America and South America, Central America, and the West Indies is less than that between the United States and the Far East. Furthermore, the potentialities of our trade with China will be greater when improved communications make it possible to tap those centers of population and resources of the Asiatic continent now out of economic communications with much of the rest of the world. The American group would not require any such large sum as six or seven million dollars by way of subsidies to support the pioneer years of its activities in China and to hold the great and obvious advantage for American trade, but would be able to operate successfully on a subsidy of about a million dollars.

Thus, with one-sixth or one-seventh of the amount now being dispensed in subsidies to the South American services, and with even greater American trade potentialities, we should be able to hold our place in competition with German or other interests in China and to play a very important part in opening up the internal resources of China to the outside world and in particular to America. It would be a master stroke in trade diplomacy, and it would do more to help in the advancement of American trade prestige in China than could probably be accomplished with an expenditure of a similar sum of money in any other direction. Certainly, after two or three years the subsidy could be reduced. There exists the probability that these operations may become self-supporting after a few years.

REDUCTION OF POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a statement by the Postmaster General with reference to the effect of the proposed 10 per cent cut on the Post Office Department, which I have strongly opposed. I want it particularly understood that I disagree with the furlough and the five day a week on the per diem basis plan. I believe we can get along without them and without a cut in Federal wages and salaries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

Postmaster General Walter F. Brown told the Senate Committee on Appropriations to-day that the flat reduction ordered by the Senate in the appropriations for the Post Office Department, without adopting the President's plan as proposed to the House Economy Committee, would demoralize the Postal Service and work a permanent injury to not less than 40,000 faithful postal employees. Mr. Brown said in part:

"Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Senate Committee on Appropriations, I appreciate this opportunity of appearing before your committee on behalf of the postal patrons of our country and on behalf of the 350,000 postal workers whom I have the honor to represent.

"It goes without saying that the Post Office Department desires to cooperate whole-heartedly in any effort to reduce postal expenditures. Substantial reductions in this time of emergency should be, and can be, made, but, as the President has repeatedly pointed out, this can not be accomplished without discharging from 30,000 to 40,000 postal employees and drastically curtailing the Postal Service unless Congress, as provided by his plan, will meet the necessity of suspending or amending the laws which impose unnecessary expenditures on the Postal Service. If the President's plan is adopted, the savings desired can be realized except where the Government is under contractual obligation to make definite expenditures.

"In considering this problem certain fundamental principles must be borne in mind. The Postal Establishment is unique among the Federal departments in that it is a Government-operated public utility, the function of which is the collection, transportation, and delivery of personal communications, money, printed matter, and merchandise for the individual citizens of the United States. Like any other public utility, the department should perform for its patrons whatever service they require and are willing to pay for. It should not exact from them more than the cost of its operations, conducted in accordance with sound business practices, and it should not impose a burden upon the General Treasury by charging less than the cost of its operations. If the necessities of the Treasury so require, the Government may, with propriety, levy an excise tax on postal operations, just as upon the business of any other public utility. But the revenue derived therefrom should not be covered into the General Treasury at the expense of the service to postal patrons who buy the service and pay the tax. I can think of no justification for increasing postage rates and at the same time curtailing service to the public.

"And let me say, with the candor which the present grave situation demands, that if anyone entertains the view that the present Postal Service can be maintained by withholding adequate appropriations at the present time and by voting deficiency appropriations at some more propitious time after November, he is wholly mistaken. We are obliged by law to limit expenditures week by week and month by month to the ratable share of the gross sum appropriated for each respective item. It follows that if the Post Office Department appropriations for 1933 are arbitrarily cut 10 per cent without amending or suspending the laws relating to the compensation of public employees, their hours of work, furloughs, allowances, and promotions, we must abandon or reduce many services now performed for postal patrons and run the risk of seriously impairing the efficiency of the services which may remain.

"A brief analysis of the items carried in the House bill will, in my judgment, make it clear that the arbitrary reduction proposed by the Senate is altogether ill-advised unless it is accompanied by the suspension or amendment of the laws to which reference has been made. Of the $805,000,000 in the bill as it passed the House, approximately $105,000,000 is for the compensation of railroads for carrying the mails. The rates of compensation for this service are fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The amount payable depends upon the volume of mail handled and is not subject to departmental action. On the basis of the anticipated business for the fiscal year 1933, no substantial reduction can be made in this sum of $105,000,000 unless service is abandoned on many trains and storage cars substituted for post-office cars, thus greatly slowing up the service. About $90,000,000 is to cover obligations to other carriers of the mails, including shipping companies, air transport companies, mail messengers, screen-wagon operators, and star-route carriers. Because this service is largely covered by long-term contracts, assuming that the Government intends to carry out its obligations, this item is susceptible of only a small reduction. The sum of $23,000,000 is for rental, heating, and lighting of post-office quarters. The department's obligations in this particular are also covered in large part by long-term contracts. Approximately $17,000,000 is for supplies, equipment, travel, and miscellaneous operating expenses, barely sufficient to cover the department's minimum needs if the Postal Service is to be continued.

"These four items aggregate $235,000,000. The remainder of the amount carried in the House bill for the Postal Service, approximately $570,000,000, is for salaries and wages of the officers and employees of the department in the District of Columbia, and the salaries, wages, and allowances of postmasters, supervisors, clerks, carriers, messengers, laborers, watchmen, and other employees in the field. Thus it is manifest that more than three-quarters of the $80,000,000 which the Senate proposes to cut from the bill must be applied against the appropriation of $570,000,000 for salaries and wages. The necessary reduction in this item will compel us to drop from the rolls between 30,000 and 40,000 postal workers of all classes, including departmental employees, assistant postmasters, clerks, city and village carriers, rural carriers, and railway postal clerks. Obviously there will not be available a sufficient force to maintain the present postal facilities. It will be necessary to consolidate about 8,000 rural routes and place about 9,000 others on a basis of triweekly instead of daily service. Delivery service must be discontinued in every small town. In the cities it will be necessary to reduce residential deliveries to one a day and business deliveries to not more than two a day. The hours of window service at post offices must be reduced, and, wherever the terms of leases will permit, post-office stations and branches must be closed. I need not state what the effect of all these changes would be upon the postal service, which has been developed to a high standard of efficiency over a period of 150 years.

"I shall be pleased at all times to make available to your committee any information which the department has and to inform you with respect to the effect on the service of any specific cuts which you may contemplate. But unless the Congress will incorporate in the appropriation bill the features applying to the Postal Service contained in the President's economy program transmitted to the House Committee on Economy, I can make no other recommendations with respect to postal appropriations than those which I made to your committee at the hearings on the House bill some weeks ago. The responsibility for demoralizing the Postal Service and doing an irreparable injury to thousands of faithful postal employees must rest upon some one other than me.

"On the other hand, if the Senate will incorporate in the bill the features of the President's economy program to which reference has been made, I shall be pleased to state what savings in specific appropriations can be made thereby.

"It may interest you to know that the officers of the Association of Presidential Postmasters, which group has received the smallest increase in pay since 1919, amounting to approximately 20 per cent, have assured me that their members will accept the 30 days' furlough without pay, in accordance with the President's program, as their contribution in the present emergency. In my judgment, the rank and file of postal workers will much prefer the President's plan of 30 days' furlough, without pay, which preserves the basic wage scale, to the plan proposed by members of the House Economy Committee, which involves substantially a 10 per cent reduction in basic pay, or the Senate's proposal, which involves the discharge of thirty or forty thousand of their fellow employees.

"The President's plan, which provides for staggering work in the Government just as industry is now doing, will discharge no one, but will give employment to at least 20,000 substitutes. Moreover, it will effect great savings, at the same time maintaining the present high standard of service."

GRANTS OF PUBLIC LAND FOR SCHOOLS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3570) to amend the act entitled "An act confirming in States and Territories title to land granted by the United States in the aid of common or public schools," approved January 25, 1927, which were, on page 1, line 3, to strike out "subsection" and insert "subsections (b) and" and on page 1, after line 7, to insert:

(b) That the additional grant made by this act is upon the express condition that all sales, grants, deeds, or patents for any of the lands so granted shall hereafter be subject to and contain a reservation to the State of all the coal and other minerals in the lands so sold, granted, deeded, or patented, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same. The coal and other mineral deposits in such lands not heretofore disposed of by the State shall be subject to lease by the State as the State legislature may direct, the proceeds and rentals and royalties therefrom to be utilized for the support or in aid of the common or public schools: Provided, That any lands or minerals hereafter disposed of contrary to the provisions of this act shall be forfeited to the United States by appropriate proceedings instituted by the Attorney General for that purpose in the United States district court for the district in which the property or some part thereof is located.

Mr. BRATTON. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

FARM LIFE AND CONDITIONS IN DENMARK

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask permission to print in the RECORD a radio address made to-day by John A. Simpson, president of the National Farmers' Union, over a nation-wide hook-up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

ORGANIZATION AND COOPERATION AS I SAW IT IN DENMARK, AND THE SITUATION IN THE NATIONAL CAPITAL

DENMARK

At this time last year I was in Europe. Primarily I went there to attend a world-wide wheat conference held in Rome, Italy, the last two weeks of March, 1931. Delegates attended this convention from 48 nations. Wheat-importing nations all told of governmental assistance to encourage farmers to produce more wheat. Exporting countries such as Canada, Argentina, Australia, and Russia all declared they would be increasing acreage and production for years to come. Under such circumstances there is little hope for a profitable export market to the farmers of this country in the near future.

One of the features of the convention was a session addressed by Mussolini. He spoke in French, and as I read it in English it was a very sensible talk. He is a man with a lot of personality and a doer of things as well as a preacher. Those with whom I talked, who had been visiting Italy for the last 30 years, told me of the wonderful changes in cleanliness, in policing, in modernizing homes, farms, and cities since Mussolini has been in charge of the Italian Government. Italy has a King, but no one talks about the King; everything is Mussolini. Italy is different in the matter of agriculture from many European countries. The farms are large estates operated by tenants. In France and Denmark agriculture is made up of small home-owning farmers. The landlords of Italy for hundreds of years have treated their tenants like slaves. These tenants live in hay huts that had neither windows nor doors, just openings. The hay huts are round like a ball cut into halves. A hut 12 feet in diameter would house a whole family. Since Mussolini has come into power he is requiring landlords to build large, modern apartment buildings in the center of their estates with an apartment for each tenant. Where this has been done the hay huts have been destroyed. Likewise, these landlords have been compelled to drain and terrace where needed. To increase acreage and production of wheat the Government of Italy guarantees a minimum price equal to $1.60 a bushel. This assistance has resulted in the farmers sowing wheat everywhere. I saw hundreds of thousands of acres of wheat growing between the rows of grapes in their vineyards. The rows of grapes are so close together that the cradle would be the only means of harvesting the wheat. Italians told me that during the World War they suffered because they depended on overseas countries for bread. They expect to develop the wheat production in their country to the point that in the next war they will have bread of their own.

But I must get to Denmark for my subject is organization and cooperation as I saw it in Denmark. At the wheat conference in Rome the delegate from Denmark was a Mr. Holm, president of the Farmers' Union of that country. When he found out I was going to visit Denmark he made me promise to allow the Farmers' Union to be our host while there. I say "our host" because my wife was with me. When we landed in Copenhagen, we reported to Mr. Holm's office. After about a half day's visit in their headquarters, he placed us in charge of Mr. and Mrs. Claussen, workers in the headquarters of the Farmers' Union there. Mr. and Mrs. Claussen spoke English fluently. Both of them had attended school in the United States after finishing in their own country. In fact, Mr. Holm worked as a hired man in the United States for several years. He worked for some farmer out in Oregon. He told me that while working for this man he was invited one time to speak to a Farmers' Union county convention. He rode 40 miles on a horse to attend this convention, and returned the same night. The man he was working for gave him just one day's vacation for the purpose. Mr. and Mrs. Claussen took my wife and I for two days in their car. I would ask to see a cooperative creamery, and they would show us two or three. I would ask to see a cooperative packing plant, and they would drive us to one. I would ask to see a cooperative cheese factory, and we would be visiting one in less than an hour. I would ask to visit a large-scale farmer, and they would take us to one.

We visited a Mr. Newman, who has a farm of 800 acres. He had a beautiful house with 25 rooms. I venture two of the rooms were not less than 30 by 50 feet. The rooms were as elegantly furnished as they were large and as there were many of them. This man had 200 milch cows in the stanchions and 700 hogs in fattening pens. He had 12 pens, with 60 to a pen. He sold 60 hogs every week and bought sixty 2-month-old weaned pigs every week. This meant that at five months old he marketed hogs that weighed 200 pounds. They standardize on everything. Hogs must be pure white in color and strictly bacon type. Mr. Newman, I think, was about 55 years old. He told me he was not in debt, his farm was clear, and that he maintained this beautiful home with no other income than that from his 800 acres of land.

I visited a medium-sized farm owned by a Mr. Larsen. It contained 90 acres. He had a beautiful place. His house was well arranged and had 10 rooms. We visited a number of what are called the small farmers. They consisted of farms from 10 to 30 acres. All of these farms were well kept. The yards and gardens looked like they were professionally landscaped. There were no dilapidated or run-down buildings. In fact, practically all buildings in Denmark are of stone, brick, or tile, and all roofs are either tile, slate, or thatched. I thought a thatched roof would be short-lived, but to my surprise I found that they last from 30 to 50 years; much longer than shingles in this country.

The State furnishes an abundance of schools but farmers add to these, many cooperative institutions of learning that they own and operate just like they do their cheese factories or creameries. They told me a most wonderful story of cooperation. They started to practice cooperation about 75 years ago. When they started just 15 per cent of the farmers owned the farms on which they lived; 85 per cent were tenants. After 75 years of cooperation, that situation has been reversed. To-day 85 per cent of the farmers of Denmark own the farms on which they live; just 15 per cent are tenants. In this country 75 years ago more than 85 per cent of our farmers owned their homes; to-day, less than half of the farmers of this Nation own their homes. In Denmark 85 per cent of the farm homes have electricity, telephone, radio, running water. In fact, they are modern. In this country less than 10 per cent have these things. In some of the Southern States less than 1 per cent of the farm homes are modern. In Denmark a dairy farmer sells all his products to some farmers' cooperative. He can not sell any other place because there is no other place to sell. The hog raisers do not take their hogs to some private dealer. They sell them to some farmers' cooperative packing plant, because there is no other place to sell to. The farmers are nearly 100 per cent in their Farmers' Union class organization and practically 100 per cent in their farmers' cooperative marketing organizations. The farmer who produces hogs in Denmark knows before the pigs are born what he is to get for them when they are ready for the market.

The population of Denmark is about three millions, one million of which live in the city of Copenhagen, another million in the towns and smaller cities, and one million out on the farms. The farmers of Denmark are about the same percentage of the total population of that country as the farmers are of this country. In this country, through lack of organization, farmers have very little to say about the affairs of our State and National Governments. In Denmark, through 100 per cent organization, they dominate all governmental affairs. They have a King in Denmark, but Mr. Stauning, Prime Minister, who is an ex-president of their Farmers' Union, writes the messages of the King and tells him where to sign. Those farmers are only one-third of the population of their country, but, through organization, control all legislation. The farmers here are one-third of the population of the country, but through lack of organization we are about the weakest group in national legislation. Denmark should be a lesson to the farmers of this country. We should get into our class organization 100 per cent, and then market all of our products through our own cooperative business institutions.

When we do this, our just part in the affairs of government will follow as night the day. If we were organized 100 per cent, as are the farmers of Denmark, no President would write a message to Congress without consulting the farmers of the Nation; no Congressman or Senator would propose a bill for agriculture that did not have the indorsement of the farmers of the Nation. It is up to you farmers listening in to join your class organization, the Farmers' Union. It is up to you listening in who are members to get those who are not members into the organization.

We farmers must not blame the bankers, the merchants, the lawyers, or somebody else for our troubles. They can not solve our problems; no one can solve our problems but ourselves. We can only solve them through organization. They will never be solved in any other way. Every day you put off organizing your community 100 per cent delays the time when agriculture will be on an equality with other industries.

The situation in the National Capital

TAXATION

I am glad to be able to report progress on the tax question. The legislative program of the National Farmers' Union on this question provides for eliminating as nearly as possible every kind of a tax that falls upon the poor people of the country. Our program on the tax question provides for income-tax rates on the higher income brackets sufficient to pay all the running expenses of the Government. Our legislative program provides for inheritance taxes that take everything from an estate above one-half million dollars to each heir.

They talk about balancing the Budget. If they will eliminate all the graft in government, it will balance the Budget. This is not an extravagant statement. I ask you to write to Congressman THOMAS L. BLANTON for a copy of House Joint Resolution 355. This tells a little of the graft in one department. Here is one of over 6,935 cases in this department.

William W. Smith was taken into the Army 13 days before the armistice. He was given a swivel-chair commission. Soon after the war he was given a job in the Veterans' Bureau; is now one of 64 other lawyers in that department. He is drawing a salary of $9,000 per year as an attorney, although he admits he has never tried a case in court in his life. He has also been drawing, for a number of years, disability compensation in the sum of $187 per month.

All of these 6,935 cases are similar. None of them show any war service except office service. Nearly all of them qualify for this compensation on the complaint of having a leaky heart. I suggest that they be reexamined for the itch. It will probably disclose the part most affected is the palm of the hand.

The tax bill as it passed the House was a great victory for the Farmers' Union and other farm organizations. During the war income-tax and surtax rates reached a climax of 72 per cent. Under the influence of Mellon and Morgan on the present administration these rates had been reduced until they were about 20 per cent. Ours was a victory to the extent that these rates were almost trebled. The rates on inheritance taxes were trebled. The President, the leaders of both the Republican and Democratic Parties of the House, all fought placing these rates so high, and all of them fought to place the burden on the consumption of the great mass of common people of the country in a general sales tax. Thanks to the response of members of the Farmers' Union all over the United States, Congress was literally covered up with wires, letters, petitions, and resolutions against the sales tax and in favor of higher rates on income and inheritance taxes.

The battle is now on in the Senate. Big manufacturers, big bankers, that gambling inferno, the New York Stock Exchange, and every kind of big business has been here for two weeks testifying before the Senate Finance Committee asking for a reduction in these high rates on incomes and inheritance taxes; also asking to have the general sales tax put back into the bill. We farm-organization leaders have testified against this. We will lose unless you soldiers back at the crossroads come to our aid. It is absolutely necessary, if you want to keep poverty from being taxed, that you wire, write, and petition your two Senators to oppose the sales tax and support the higher income and inheritance tax rates. You have won one battle; you must win another one in order to win the war.

There are two battles in this war. I hope what you did in the House battle will be duplicated in the Senate battle. Remember the proposed general sales tax raises $600,000,000 by a tax on consumption. This is an average of $5 per person, or $25 per family. A tax on consumption means that a poor farmer or working man pays about the same tax as does a very rich man, because the very rich man consumes little more than a common laborer. An income tax makes those pay who are able to pay, which is fair.

THE WAIL OF THE RICH

When the farmers and laborers defeated the sales tax in the House nearly all the big newspapers in the United States cried like their hearts would break. Mellon, Morgan, and others of the international bankers' class wrote a song called "The Wail of the Rich," and that great tenor, William Randolph Hearst, sang the song through his great chain of papers, the greatest in the world. I quote from the Washington Herald of March 25:

"We will have to use the old automobile and wear the old suits.

"We will have to relinquish those pretty things at the shops that we would like to have for ourselves and the family.

"We will have to get along with the old house and postpone the painting job for another year or two.

"We will have to patch up the old furniture and dispense with all luxuries and even comforts.

"We will have to give up some amusements and abandon that trip or vacation we had been intending to take with the 'folks,' and we will have to save every dollar to give to the Government."

Don't let anybody fool you into believing that a general sales tax is a good thing for the common people. Every argument used is that it is a system of theft by stealth, a system in which you tax the poor without their knowing they are being robbed. If they once get this system started, they will increase the rates and include more things under the system until wealth will be relieved of every bit of income and inheritance tax.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

In the legislative program of the National Farmers' Union is a demand for Philippine independence. We have taken an active part in promoting this legislation through this session of Congress. We have been successful to the extent that the House offers a bill granting the Philippines independence in 8 years, and the Senate one granting independence in 19 years. It is our hope that the Senate will recede from its position and adopt the House bill. We fought for independence in five years.

Every day we own the Philippines we are one day nearer the time when that ownership will involve us in the biggest war we were ever in. The quicker we get rid of them the quicker we eliminate the opportunity for that war.

THE FARM BOARD

The National Farmers' Union in their last annual convention by resolution demanded of Congress "a thorough and searching investigation of the Farm Board and its set-ups." I am glad to report that the Senate has authorized such an investigation. I wish you would write to Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY, chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee, asking that this be a real investigation and not a whitewash. There are those who would like to make a whitewash of it.

THE THREE BILLS

We are still working for passage of the three Farmers' Union measures that we firmly believe will remedy the terrible conditions that exist in this country.

First, the Frazier bill, numbered S. 1197. This bill refinances farmers on a basis of 1½ per cent interest and on a basis of Government money instead of bankers' money.

All interest is usury and is forbidden in the teachings of Christ. It is a cancer on the body politic. I saw where two men in Baton Rouge, Mr. J. D. Stottler and Mr. R. E. Collins, made a bet on the question of whether or not a certain building there would be good in 500 years. One bet $2.50 that it would be a good building and the other $2.50 that it would not. They placed the money in the local bank where it was to remain 500 years and draw interest at the rate of 3 per cent compounded semiannually. A mathematician figured that the heirs of the winner would have due from that bet at the end of 500 years $2,084,495,605.22.

I believe you will agree that my statement is not extravagant when I say interest is the most deadly of diseases—a cancer. It eats the life out of everything it touches.

Second. The Swank-Thomas bill, which is numbered in the House as H. R. 7797 and in the Senate as S. 3133. This is known as the cost of production bill for that part of farmers' crops used in this country. After being refinanced under the Frazier bill, we must have cost of production for what the home folks use if we pay off principal on a basis of interest even as low as 1½ per cent.

Third. The Wheeler bill, No. S. 2487. This provides for the remonetization of silver. This bill is absolutely necessary in order that we may sell our products to other countries. Under a high-priced gold-standard dollar other countries can sell their products here but can not buy from us. England has been off the gold standard now for about six months. Her money has been cheapened at least 25 per cent. The Canadian dollar as measured by our gold-standard dollar is worth only 75 cents. Since going off the gold standard Canada now ships in five times the poultry and dairy products she was shipping in six months ago. She can pay the tariff, get our high-priced dollar, take it home, change it into their cheap dollar at about $1.33 for one of ours, and have a profit.

About the only progress I have to report on these bills is that the Senate Agriculture Committee has invited all farm-organization leaders to appear before the committee next Tuesday, April 26, for the purpose of agreeing on a farm-relief program. Many Congressmen and Senators, through the efforts of the citizens in their districts by writing and otherwise communicating with them, have been converted and are now supporting these three bills who would not support them in the beginning.

Let me urge every one of you to continue your efforts along these lines. We may not get this legislation through at this session of Congress, but we will get it in some future session or there will be revolution in this country. I mean by that that these three bills are real remedies; these three bills on the day they become a part of the laws of this country will start an immediate return to prosperity. Nothing less will do it. If it is not done, the only alternative is revolution.

The Farmers' Union is fighting to prevent revolution. The big interests of this country are doing everything they can to bring on revolution. If it comes they will be the ones who are guilty and they will be the ones who will suffer most. Their greed, selfishness, and avarice have blinded them to where they can not see the inevitable doom that awaits them.

AN UNPLEASANT TASK

You must know it is not a pleasant task to tell the citizens of this country that our Government discriminates between classes. I have but one object in calling these things to your attention and that is to arouse your interest in affairs of government. I do not like to deal in the sins of men; I would much rather talk about their virtues. However, the great mass of common people of this country will never do their duty as citizens except as they understand and know that because in the past they have not done their duty they are not receiving a fair deal from those in power in this country.

Take the national bankers as a class. They have the privilege when they have certain Government promises to pay of laying those promises down on the counter of the Secretary of the Treasury and receiving par in national-bank notes, which they can loan out to their customers at high rates of interest, and continue to draw Government interest on the bonds left as a guarantee that the bank will stay open and redeem the notes on request.

The ex-service boys hold securities of the Government, obligations to pay to the bearer. The Government does not permit them to receive money for them except in the last session of Congress they did provide for loaning these ex-service boys 50 per cent of the Government's obligation to them at 4½ per cent interest.

Thus we see cold-blooded bankers who never did anything for their country granted privileges by the Government that ex-service boys who faced machine guns, gas, and every kind of death-dealing instrument are denied.

In the present session of Congress bills have been passed to help railroads, banks, and the big insurance companies. Two billion dollars have been appropriated to help these interests. Fifty million was appropriated to help the drought-stricken farmers to secure feed and seed; $25,000,000 was appropriated to extend interest payments for farmers who owe Federal farm-land banks. The farming industry, in dollars and cents, is larger than bankers and railroads combined. In population we are a thousand times that of the groups represented by banks and railroads. We get seventy-five million appropriated out of two billion. This is rank discrimination. Those who administer this two billion further liberalize the provisions of Congress for the railroads, insurance companies, and banks, but make them harder for farmers.

For instance, the funds granted the railroads were to be used to employ men to repair present facilities and to employ men to expand present facilities. The international bankers, the power that dominates the present administration, liberalizes this provision in their own behalf by having the Reconstruction Finance Corporation loan large sums of money to the railroads for the purpose of paying interest on what they owed Mr. Morgan and other New York bankers. Even in paying principal on the notes they owed.

The Missouri-Pacific Railroad was loaned $5,850,000 to pay on a note owed to J. P. Morgan & Co. Altogether this railroad has received $17,100,000 for such purposes. The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad was loaned $7,000,000 to pay taxes. The old-line life-insurance companies have received millions of dollars of loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation on liberal terms.

Secretary of Agriculture Hyde makes such hard regulations that out of the $50,000,000 placed in his hands to loan to drouth-stricken farmers only a small part has been used. He lays down rules and regulations that if a widow has a team and a cow unmortgaged she is disqualified from receiving any of these funds. If a widow has everything mortgaged, then she is qualified, provided she can get her landlord and everyone she owes to relinquish their claims to any of the crop she produces for the year 1932. The facts are the Secretary has openly declared that he did not want to handle this money. He has said that to prevent these drouth-stricken farmers from getting seed and feed would be a good method of reducing production.

They also discriminate in the rates of interest as between big business and farmers. The Government has loaned millions of dollars to the shipping interests at rates as low as three-eighths to seven-eighths of 1 per cent per annum. They have loaned to foreign governments at rates as low at 1½ per cent. Farmers pay on feed and seed loans 5½ per cent. To the Federal farm-land banks they pay 5½ per cent plus a certain amount of capital stock they have to take out. When the stock goes down it amounts to more interest. The intermediate-credit loans to farmers run from 7 per cent to 9 per cent. This is rank discrimination against farmers.

I don't like to deal in these nasty truths. I would not if I did not believe it to be absolutely necessary in order to get you who are discriminated against to wake up and do your duty as a citizen by taking part in the running of the affairs of this country. I do blame Morgan and Mellon for contributing handsomely to the political parties. I do blame them for coming to Washton and working to take all the money away from the common people of this country that it is possible to get through the help of legislation. I do blame the 120,000,000 common people, who think more of a ball game or an Amos and Andy radio program than they do of studying public issues, for allowing this thing to happen. The big fellows will furnish you with amusement while they rob you.

Some one the other day spoke disparagingly of the intelligence of the Members of the House and Senate. That is not the proper view to take. There is no lack of intelligence in the House and Senate; neither is there lack of intelligence among the 120,000,000 common people of this country who send these gentlemen to Congress. There is a lack on the part of the 120,000,000 common people of devoting the intelligence they have to a proper selection of these gentlemen.

Some one wrote me commending to Congress the economies practiced by the President. He says the President commenced economizing by selling the yacht which former Presidents had used. I don't want anyone to unjustly criticize the President this way. If there is one thing he is not guilty of, it is practicing economy. He sold one yacht and bought another. He established an extensive summer camp on the Rapidan River about 100 miles out of Washington. It has been largely developed and improved by the labor of those drawing their pay from the Government.

A few nights ago the President, in behalf of the big automobile manufacturers, broadcasted advising everybody to turn in their old car and get a new one. Practicing what he preached, he turned in nine good used cars and got nine brand new ones for the use of the White House. One secretary used to be sufficient for a President. Our present President requires three secretaries, and each of these has to have an automobile. His wife has to have two and the President has two. Two are kept for the fine guests entertained there.

There is enough truth to tell about the President without misrepresenting him and I do not want anybody to charge him with practicing economy in government. He has appointed more boards, commissions, with other boards and commissions to check up on the ones first appointed, than all other Presidents put together in the history of our country.

The same party writing me spoke of the great courage of the President. Of course, courage is susceptible of different meanings, but I observe that in 17 States that provide for each political party selecting a choice for President through direct primaries the President has filed in only 1 of them.

Amazing things are done in Government circles here in Washington. The other day George F. Byers, a Government chemist in the Treasury Department, one of Andy Mellon's boys, gave a splendid recommendation to the liquor being dispensed by the bootleggers in Washington. I do not know whether these bootleggers are handling Andy's product or not. Here is what Mr. Byers said: "I can not say that there is anything definitely harmful about the quality of the liquor sold here, most of the injuries it inflicts coming from injudicious consumption of it. The rye and corn whisky shipped here is pretty raw, but after ageing can hardly be told from the medicinally legal product."

The exchanges—commodity and stock—are a part of the mess with the bad odor here in Washington. It seems Congress is waking up to the fact that the international bankers use the exchanges as one of the means of robbing the people.

I am a member of an organization that is planning a huge suit against the grain and cotton exchanges in the near future. The secretary of this organization is H. W. Worthington, Mangum, Okla. Any farmers or others interested, I urge you to write to Mr. Worthington for full information on the purpose of the organization.

While I am telling you about places to write I want to let you know that you can get full information on the Muscle Shoals power and light question by writing Judson King, Munsey Building, Washington, D. C. It is a Government-printed document and valuable information. Remember my object in this talk is to arouse the citizenship of this country to an interest in public questions.

MUST TAKE PUNISHMENT

Anyone who has the courage to speak and work for the poor people of the country as against the ultrarich must be prepared to take punishment. Congressman LAGUARDIA comes out against the sales tax. He is immediately branded unpatriotic by the henchmen of the big interests. LAGUARDIA was a Congressman when we entered the World War. He resigned and enlisted as a soldier. His father was a Spanish-American War veteran. LAGUARDIA was born in this country. Because he dared stand for the poor against the rich he was maligned and lied about.

Governor Roosevelt pledged himself to a program of help and assistance to the poor, to the distressed of the country. The spokesmen for the ultrarich cry out, calling him a demagogue.

An organization known as the Daughters of the American Revolution are having their annual convention in Washington this week. Their president, Mrs. Hobart, in addressing the convention declares the main job of the organization is to destroy radicals. Another delegate to the convention charged Jane Addams with being a radical. Jane Addams is a welfare worker of world-wide reputation, who established Hull House in Chicago. Jane Addams must take punishment for being a friend of the poor.

Christ was a radical, Patrick Henry was a radical, Abraham Lincoln was a radical. They took punishment for being radicals. If they were on earth to-day Mrs. Hobart would be denouncing them because they were radicals. For Mrs. Hobart I define a radical: A radical is a person who has the intelligence to know his rights and the courage to demand them, and fight for them if necessary. I might define a conservative, which I presume Mrs. Hobart prides herself on being: A conservative is a person who worships dead radicals.

The following advertisement, which appeared in the evening papers the night Mrs. Hobart made her speech, indicates the lack of touch these good women have with the poor of this country: "Laura Scott Fenstermacher, of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., a delegate to the Daughters of the American Revolution Congress, reported to the police to-day she had lost a diamond bracelet valued at $1,000, either in Constitution Hall or in a taxicab on the way to the Annapolis Hotel, where she is staying while in Washington."

TWO CLASSES

In closing, I want to divide this country into two classes. In one group are the 120,000,000 common people whom I will call the debtor class. In the other group are 10,000 ultrarich, whom I will call the creditor class. The 10,000 ultrarich have more voice in running the affairs of this country, and have had for a half century, than the 120,000,000 common people. All financial legislation in the past 50 years has been in the interest of creditors.

The time has come when the 120,000,000 common people must take part and see that some legislation is enacted in the interest of the debtor. You 120,000,000 will never be able to pay your debts with a dollar that buys 16 dozens of eggs from a farm woman, with a dollar that buys 3 bushels of wheat from a western Kansas farmer, with a dollar that buys 20 pounds of cotton from a Texas cotton farmer. The 120,000,000 common people must rise up and demand of Congress that they take from the bankers the power of making money. They must demand of Congress that all money must be issued by the Government as provided in the Constitution.

The present policy in three years has created an army of unemployed of 8,000,000. It has caused six and a half million farmers to lose their homes by mortgage foreclosures or tax sales, or those who have not lost them are holding only a scant equity. It has bankrupted 1,000,000 small business men. It has wrecked 10,000 once happy and prosperous small-town bankers. They have lost everything and those who are not eating at a prison table walk the streets with the rest of the jobless. Add to these 10,000 men who three years ago were what is called small millionaires. They were worth one, two, or three million, some of them five million dollars. The ultrarich are cannibals; they eat each other. The big millionaires ate up the little millionaires. Now these little millionaires are not quite out on the street, but they are walking around with us radicals. In fact, all it takes to make a Bolshevik of any man is to step on his pocketbook.

It looks like, if the present policy is continued, another four years will bring us all to the same level. They will make us a real democracy. This is on the theory that the creditor will be ruined, too. It is happening every day.

Recently, in Mississippi, 82 sheriffs auctioned off and sold 60,000 farms for taxes. These farms, bought in by the counties and State, aggregate more than 7,000,000 acres and constitute one-fourth of the farm lands of that State. In the last three years more than 70,000,000 acres in the United States have thus become public domain. A report from Montana says that 80 per cent of the farm lands in that State have delinquent taxes against them.

I commend these thoughts to those listening in. A copy of this program will be furnished to those asking for it. Until further notice, address me, John Simpson, Kankakee, Ill.

TARIFF ON ISLAND OILS

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article appearing in the Minneapolis Tribune in the nature of an interview with Dr. Alonzo E. Taylor, a world famous chemist, and two editorials upon the subject of Philippine independence and a duty on fats and oils.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article and editorials are as follows:

URGES TARIFFS ON ISLAND OILS—ALONZO TAYLOR, ECONOMIST AND CHEMIST, CITES INJUSTICE TO UNITED STATES FARMER

"As an economist, I have no hesitancy in saying that our Government should immediately take effective steps to stop the importation of tropical oils into the United States. The greatest menace that confronts the American farmer to-day is the Tropics."

This is the gist of an interview given to the Tribune Saturday by Dr. Alonzo E. Taylor, world famous chemist and economist, who was in the city as the guest of James Ford Bell. Doctor Taylor left Saturday night to return to his home at Stanford University.

"Purely as an economist, without thought of the ethics or the political significance involved in the question, I have no hesitancy in saying that we should at once put a duty on coconut oil that now comes in free from the Philippines. We have brought over 600,000,000 pounds of coconut oils into the United States every year, and at the same time we have a tremendous surplus of fats in the United States which go begging because of these oils.

MENACE OF TROPICS

"I think that even a free trader must admit that we are now, rightly or wrongly, in an era of protective tariffs and that being the case it seems to me to be the height of folly to permit tropical oils to displace our American-produced fats. Some 12 years ago at the University of Wisconsin I delivered a lecture on 'The Menace of the Tropics.' The lecture did not attract a great deal of attention, but those who gave it any thought were not overly charitable in their estimate of my mentality. But the last dozen years have borne out the fact that the Tropics are a menace to the agriculture in the Temperate Zone.

"Not only are they a menace but they are an actual damage, and this damage will increase every year. It is a very simple thing to understand that fats—vegetable fats—can be produced cheaper in the Tropics than animal fats can be produced in the Temperate Zone. The additional sunlight and the heat of the Tropics and the fact that the fats are taken directly from vegetation rather than from an animal to whom the vegetation is fed all conspire to give the Tropics an inescapable advantage. In addition to these chemical facts there is the fact of the lower standard of living of the natives in the Tropics. The farmer in the Temperate Zone can not hope to compete with him on any basis of equality.

DOMESTIC FATS SUFFICIENT

"On the other hand, the American farmer produces fats as a by-product. The hog is raised for his bacon, not his lard. The steer is raised for beef, not for tallow. Yet we can not produce either beef or bacon without producing fats. Unless the American farmer can find a market for his fats, he suffers an additional handicap in his competition with the tropical oils.

"There is some admitted need for coconut oil in the United States. There are certain soaps that can not be made without coconut oil, but these soaps constitute a very small percentage of the total volume of soap manufactured in the United States. Probably 50,000,000 pounds of coconut oil would more than take care of the soap necessities. Beyond these necessities there is no appreciable need in the United States for coconut oil which could not be satisfied by the animal fats produced in this country, which are now a drug in the market.

"There is, of course, a widespread opinion that we can not impose a duty on importations from the Philippines. This is not a fact. Since the Philippines have come under our control, the United States has imposed duties on the importations from the islands and can do it again. We could very well make some such arrangement as was made with Cuba. We gave Cuba a preferential duty on sugar. We could impose a duty on all tropical oils and by reason of our relationship with the Philippines give them a lower duty as we do on Cuban sugar.

"I suspect that here in the Northwest you place too much emphasis on the part that coconut oil plays in the manufacture of margarine. If these tropical oils only affected butter, it would be one story, but they affect the whole fat production. Every fat suffers, and butter is merely the first on the list. The tropical oils imported into this country become many other food substitutes.

TROPICS' ADVANTAGE GROWS

"It is common knowledge that science is every day adding to the advantage the Tropics have in the production of fats. The American farmer is beset with many economic disadvantages, but so long as we protect the manufacturer in the interests of our standard of living, there is absolutely no reason why we should not protect the American farmer to the same end. The American farmer is rapidly losing his market for his animal fats by reason of the increasing importations of tropical oils, 600,000,000 pounds of which come in duty free from the Philippine Islands. There may be ethical and political reasons why the Philippines should be granted their independence or refused their independence. I am not discussing these reasons, but I do say that there is no economic reason for permitting 600,000,000 pounds of coconut oil to come into this country duty free to be substituted for animal fats produced on American farms."

TAX TROPICAL OILS

The clean-cut statement of Dr. Alonzo Taylor, world-famous economist, to the effect that it was the imperative duty of the United States to protect the American farmer from the importation of tropical oils, is both significant and timely. The present bill which proposes to grant freedom to the Philippine Islands in the future is of little present interest to the American farmer. The American farmer is primarily and exclusively interested in the economic effect of our political relationship with the Philippine Islands. It is an incontrovertible fact that 600,000,000 pounds of coconut oil and copra come into the United States every year from the Philippine Islands and drive out of our market as least as many pounds of American-produced animal and cottonseed fats. Doctor Taylor makes it plain that there is not the faintest economic reason to sustain this policy and that there is every economic reason for a policy that will protect the American farmer.

Those who maintain that we have a moral obligation to protect and cherish the Filipino may argue on a basis of morality to their hearts' content. But there isn't any morality in making the American farmer sustain the burden of our Philippine philanthropy. Doctor Taylor is as famous a chemist as he is an economist. Doctor Taylor says that only a small percentage of our soap needs coconut oil as an ingredient. This is a specialized soap not in general use. The American farmer is entitled to protection from tropical plantations to the same extent that the American workingman is entitled to protection from oriental labor. We have raised the bars on foreign immigration for the protection of the American laborer, and it is impossible to conceive the mental process of the legislator who can not see the same necessity for the protection of the American farmer from the rapidly increasing flood of tropical oils that is pouring into this country every year. America has a surplus of the animals and cottonseed fats. Animal fat is a drug on the market to-day. The swine raiser is penalized by the packer for the excess fat on his hogs. The dairyman, with the price of butter down to a ruinous level, is forced to compete with the margarine made from Philippine oil importations. When Doctor Taylor as a chemist says that there isn't any reason why American-produced fats should not be used in the manufacture of our soaps, no fair-minded person would question his statement.

Giving the Filipinos their freedom 8 or 10 years hence is a fine, generous gesture which may or may not be translated into a reality, but this does the American farmer no good to-day. In his present state he hasn't the time nor the inclination to clap his hands in glee over the spectacle of the Filipinos waving the flag of independence. It means little or nothing to him. What the American farmer wants is protection from the coconut oil from the Philippines and protection from the other oils of the Tropics against which he is unable to compete any more than is the American manufacturer able to compete with the low wage and low standard of living of foreign countries. If there is any right or justice, if there is any political or economic expediency in a protective tariff, that tariff should be imposed on the oils from the Tropics that compete with cottonseed, peanut oil, and animal fats produced in the United States.

THE FARMER IS FORGOTTEN

The bill recently passed by the House and now before the Senate which proposes to grant political freedom to the Philippines at the end of an 8-year period will be of no benefit to the American farmer.

The bill will permit the Philippines to import more coconut oil into the United States free of duty for the next eight years than is now coming in. Paragraph 2 of section 6 of the bill provides:

"There shall be levied, collected, and paid on all coconut oil coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands in any calendar year in excess of 200,000 long tons, the same rates of duty which are required by the laws of the United States to be levied, collected, and paid on like articles imported from foreign countries."

This provision is supposed to put a limitation on the oil imports from the Philippines in the interests of the American farmer. The joker in the provision is this, that the Philippines have never yet sent as much as 200,000 long tons of coconut oil to the United States. Therefore, instead of putting a limit on this duty-free oil that would tend to remedy the present ruinous condition of the American fat market, it actually permits a greater importation.

Two hundred thousand long tons of oil equals 448,000,000 pounds. In 1930 the Philippines sent us 322,000,000 pounds. Under this bill the Philippines could import free of duty an additional 126,000,000 pounds of oil to compete with American-produced cottonseed oil and animal fats. In 1929 the coconut-oil importation reached its peak of 415,000,000 pounds, some 33,000,000 pounds less than the limit permitted by the present bill.

It is obvious from these figures that for eight years at least the American farmer will get no relief if the present bill becomes a law. It is equaly plain that the bill provides an opportunity to make the situation even worse than it now is to the extent, at least, of 126,000,000 pounds of oil. Under the present tariff law coconut oil imported from other countries than the Philippines pays a duty of 2 cents a pound. But there is likewise a joker in this, because copra, from which coconut oil is extracted, comes into the United States duty free from all countries.

In 1930 the importations of oil and copra in terms of oil reached the staggering sum of 518,161,000 pounds. In 1929, the high point of importation, oil and copra importations together were equivalent to 597,836,000 pounds. The admission of copra duty free into the United States is for the benefit of the copra-crushing mills on the Pacific coast. The oil produced on the Pacific coast affects the American farmer to exactly the same degree as the duty-free oil from the Philippines.

Between the Smoot-Hawley tariff law and the Philippine independence bill the American farmer, dairyman, swine and beef raiser are deprived of the American markets for fats. The dairyman suffers grievously from the production of margarine, which is sold at a lower price than butter. The swine raiser and the cattleman are in the same predicament as is the cotton grower of the South, who loses the market for his cottonseed oil.

The bill now before the Senate is not a bill conceived in the interest of the American farmer, but exclusively in the interests of the political aspirations of the Filipinos. The very best the American farmer can hope for is the possible limitation to the damage that may be done to him in the next eight years. This limitation is a possibility only and by no means a probability. Under this bill the Philippines can add some 25 per cent to their present imports before they are required to pay a duty, and should their imports reach 200,000 long tons a year, at which point a duty of 2 cents would be imposed on their oil, they still have the opportunity to ship into the United States free of duty all the copra that this country can consume at the expense of the American farmer.

Any bill providing for the independence of the Philippines can be of no economic interest to the American farmer unless it reduces drastically the coconut oil imports, and in turn there can be no reduction of coconut oil imports as long as copra is permitted to come into this country free of duty. The interest of the American farmer in the Philippine Islands is not a political one, it is strictly economic. The issue involves a much vaster area than the Philippine Islands. The issue is that of tropical oils of any description which are used in the United States as substitutes for food fats and for vegetable oils produced in this country. The question will not be settled by the passage of the Hare bill. Should it pass the Senate and receive the President's signature, it will not affect the American farmer in the least. It will leave him in the same or in a worse position for the next eight years than he now is.

The American farmer wants and should have ample protection from coconut oil and copra and from all tropical oils which are now so disastrously competing with him in the American fat market. The Hare bill gives him no protection whatever.

AIR MAIL SERVICE TO LATIN AMERICA

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD a number of letters received by the Pan American-Grace Airways (Inc.), which has a contract with our Government for Central and South American air mail. These letters protest against the proposed reduction in air mail service which has been suggested under the 10 per cent cut in appropriations for the Post Office Department and show the importance to American industry in the continuation of that service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters are as follows:

NEW YORK, April 21, 1932.

The Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SENATOR: At the request of Mr. Robert H. Patchin I am sending you to-day by express a binder containing a great number of letters we have received from officials of many industries expressing an opinion as to the value of air mail service to Latin America.

Respectfully yours,

PAN AMERICAN-GRACE AIRWAYS (INC.),
J. D. MACGREGOR,
Vice President and General Manager.

CHICAGO, ILL., May 6, 1931.

PAN AMERICAN-GRACE AIRWAYS (INC.),
New York City.

(Attention Mr. J. D. MacGregor, vice president and general manager.)

GENTLEMEN: We wish to acknowledge with thanks your letter of May 1 regarding air service to South America.

We use this service regularly and although we have no outstanding incidents to describe, we do wish to say that this air service has proven to be extremely helpful to us, to say the least. Practically all of our more important mail is now sent by air, and we are very much pleased with the service.

Yours very truly,

ALEMITE CORPORATION,
R. K. TORSON,
Export Manager.

SANTIAGO, December 22, 1930.

GRACE & CIA.,
Casilla No. 14–D, Pte.

DEAR SIRS: In reply to your letter of December 19 regarding the Panagra air mail we would advise that we have no comments to make except perhaps to state that we use this service regularly and have found same satisfactory.

Very truly yours,

P. SOC. MFRA. ALLIS-CHALMERS,
L. F. JAMES, Santiago Office.

ALUMINUM LINE,
New Orleans, La., May 4, 1931.

Mr. J. D. MACGREGOR,
Vice President and General Manager
Pan American-Grace Airways (Inc.),
New York, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your letter of May 1, we do not have occasion to use air mail service to the west coast of Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, Chile, Argentina, Uruguay, and Paraguay, and are therefore not in a position to give you any data in regard to said service.

We do, however, make frequent and quite extensive use of Pan American air mail service to the east coast of Colombia, Venezuela, Jamaica, Haiti, Santo Domingo, the Windward and Leeward Islands, and British and Dutch Guiana. We find this latter service to be of considerable value and assistance in our steamship operations in the territory mentioned. The saving in time by using the air mail has enabled us to handle innumerable matters by mail which we would have otherwise handled by cable less satisfactorily and at much greater expense.

Yours very truly,

WM J. FINLAN,
General Manager Southern Division.

LONG ISLAND CITY, N. Y., March 12, 1931.

PAN AMERICAN-GRACE AIRWAYS (INC.),
New York City.
(Attention Mr. W. M. North.)

GENTLEMEN: We acknowledge receipt of your kind favor dated March 10, 1931, and since the time of your recent visit literature has been received here in connection with your air mail service, for which we thank you.

You will no doubt be glad to know that we are using your mail service in connection with our transactions in the foreign countries: Panama, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, Chile, Argentina, and Uruguay.

We have found that the use of air mail is most helpful, particularly on involved matters wherein quick decisions are necessary, and to transmit the data by cable would be most expensive.

Very truly yours,

AMERICAN CHICLE CO.,
T. J. MACDONALD,
Export Manager.

JANUARY 15, 1931.

Mr. WALTER F. BROWN,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR POSTMASTER GENERAL: We are pleased to inform you that since the inauguration of the airplane mail to the west coast of South America under the control of the Pan American-Grace Airways (Inc.) we have consistently used this service and have found it in every way highly satisfactory.

We are now beginning to use the service on the east coast to Rio de Janeiro and Santos, and feel sure that this newer service of the Pan American Airways (Inc.) will prove equally satisfactory.

Very truly yours,

AMERICAN COFFEE CORPORATION.
FRANCIS M. KURTZ.

AMERICAN EXPRESS CO.,
New York, May 28, 1931.

Mr. WILLIAM N. NORTH,
Pan American-Grace Airways (Inc.), 122 East
Forty-second Street, New York, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: We thank you for having sent us the maps, schedules, and rates covering your company's service.

You may be interested in learning that we use "Pan American" service to a great extent and in many cases find it indispensable. This is particularly true in cases where we find it impossible to connect documents with the carrying steamer and therefore have to rely on your service to see that documents reach destination before carrying steamer. As a matter of fact, we use your service whenever we desire prompt reports from any of our correspondents located in the West Indies, Central or South America.

In conclusion, permit us to say that the service rendered is A–1 and we shall continue to use it whenever the circumstances warrant.

Yours very truly,

GEO. WESTON,
Vice President and Treasurer.

HOBOKEN, N. J., March 6, 1931.

PAN AMERICAN-GRACE AIRWAYS (INC.),

(Attention Mr. William M. North.)

GENTLEMEN: Concerning your letter of March 5, we would say that we shall continue to encourage the use of your plane service, as we believe that the growth of such operations is necessary for the development and maintenance of our Latin American business.

Yours very truly,

AMERICAN LEAD PENCIL CO.,
GERARD NOLAN,

Messrs. GRACE & Co.,
Santiago, Chile, South America.

GENTLEMEN: I have just received your letter of December 19, regarding the Panagra air mail service to the United States, and take pleasure in advising you that we have found it exceedingly satisfactory. So far, to our knowledge, no letter has ever gone astray and has always been delivered at destination as per schedule.

Very truly yours,

DEAR SIR: We have your letter of November 25, 1930, in which you ask that we give you a report on the air mail service of the Panagra line.

Recently we have obtained much better results from the use of the air mail service than we did during the earlier months of its inception. We are using the Ovalle station to catch the Panagra line for mail to the United States, and we find that it is the best service that we can secure. We have recently been checking up the dates of arrival of mail here in Potrerillos which has come by air from the States, and we find that in almost every case the mail is delivered to us as quickly as possible with the connections which are available.

GENTLEMEN: Referring to Mr. North's call upon us a few days ago, we would say that we are using your service exclusively where we use air mail, except to Colombia. The service has so far proven entirely satisfactory.

You will, of course, understand that in certain cases, even where our preference might be to use air mail, we are obliged to use rail and steamer service as shipping contracts often call for certain documents to be sent on the carrier of the merchandise.

GENTLEMEN: We use quite regularly the air mail service to west-coast and east-coast countries of South America in communicating to our agents various matters in connection with the sale of our fabrics in their countries and have always found this service to be exceedingly fast and convenient.

Only a few weeks ago in trying to make new connections for our representation in Montevideo we communicated by air mail with a prospective agent giving a great deal of information regarding our line and other matters which could not very well have been treated by cable and the agent in question replied accepting our proposition. This is one of the many instances where time is a major consideration and the short number of days it takes to communicate with far-off places is a distinct advantage.

We frequently have occasion to use your service to South American countries. While we do not keep a record of such transactions, I do know of one case in particular where we were able to land a large order by promptly submitting our figures by air mail.

Whenever shipments are made we also use your service in advising our customers names of steamer and date and port from which it leaves, and are sure this is very satisfactory, since it gives consignee plenty of time to arrange every detail before shipment arrives.

GENTLEMEN: Answering your letter of the 13th instant, we would advise you that we are using the air mail to quite an extent in the Central American countries and Colombia and Venezuela. To a smaller extent we are using the air mail to the Argentine, but this is due to decreased business in that market and also in Chile.

We feel, however, that air mail is a vital factor, and is serving to bring foreign markets into very much closer contact, and it is our feeling that there will be a very heavy increase in air mail traffic after houses both here and abroad realize the value of the service.

GENTLEMEN: We have been using the air mail between the United States and the Argentine with considerable satisfaction.

The air mail has been most valuable in enabling us to promptly get reports of conditions in the Argentine affecting our policies of doing business there.

We can not say that the same results have been obtained from communication with the more northern countries, such as Colombia. We can not find any saving in time or service in sending our correspondence to Colombia by air mail. We hope, however, that the schedules will eventually allow a considerable saving in the transmitting of messages between the United States and Colombia.

DEAR MR. MACGREGOR: We are pleased to acknowledge your letter of the 15th and take this opportunity to tell you that we are making extensive use of air mail throughout Central and South America. In fact, air mail has supplanted over 50 per cent of the communications we formerly sent by cable to this territory.

Attached herewith is a copy of a letter which we have just sent to your traffic department and which holds possibilities for further use of air mail. Of course, our use of this will be governed entirely upon the cost.

Attention Mr. W. M. NORTH,
Pan American-Grace Airways (Inc.),
New York, N. Y.

DEAR SIRS: We refer to your recent personal call, requesting that we outline our experience and the benefits derived from the use of your air mail service to South America.

We have already addressed your Mr. MacGregor on the subject; nevertheless, we wish to add a few more lines here.

One of the stipulations of an important agreement we made recently contained the provision that all documents were to be forwarded by air mail so that they might be in our possession within a week or 10 days ahead of the arrival of the steamer carrying the merchandise at the American port. This stipulation will involve the extensive use of your air mail service from July 1 on.

All important remittances of funds from South America in the form of checks or drafts now come by air mail, as do all drawings of South American banks on us. The use of air mail for these remittances and drawings has started a controversial discussion among the various banks who contend that their rates when selling their checks on New York are based on a 15 or 20 day schedule of the maritime routes and that they lose interest by having their checks arrive before time by air mail. I have no doubt that in a short time all checks on New York for amounts of any importance will be forwarded by air mail and the various South American banks will find it necessary to adjust their rates in accordance with this new service. This is already being done by some of the institutions in that territory.

Very truly yours,

D. A. DEL RIO,
Assistant Vice President.

CLEVELAND, OHIO, October 8, 1930.

GENTLEMEN: On all of our collections to South America where we can conveniently use air mail, we are doing so. Some time ago we sent a draft for collection to Buenos Aires. As I recall it, the amount was approximately $4,000. We specified that settlement should be made by air mail. From the time that the draft was paid in Buenos Aires until it reached our hands, 10 days had elapsed. If this remittance had come by vessel it would have taken approximately 31 days; in other words, 21 days' time was saved by using air mail. Figuring the interest on $4,000 for 21 days at 6 per cent, after deducting air mail postage, actually meant a saving of approximately $10.

You may rest assured that when we can advantageously use air mail we do so. We are in hopes of using this service more extensively as time goes on.

DEAR SIR: We are pleased to advise you of our experience with the air mail service between New York and Chile, South America.

We are able to reach our mines at Chuquicamata, Chile, near the port of Antofagasta, by air mail in 6 days, whereas the regular mail consumes at least 16 days. This has been of great advantage to us, as it has not only speeded up our correspondence but has enabled us to reduce materially the number of cablegrams exchanged with our mine offices. Much of our important and emergency correspondence is now handled by the air mail between New York and Chile, and we can, therefore, testify to the usefulness and value of this service to the company.

DEAR SIR: Relative to your letter of the 19th instant, we beg to advise that we make considerable use of the Panagra air mail and find the service quite satisfactory.

The only observation we could make—and we presume that this does not actually affect the Panagra service—is that there is some delay (one or two days after the arrival of the plane) in the delivery of the registered mail (certificados). Perhaps you could have this corrected in the proper quarters.

DEAR SIRS: Referring to your letter inquiring about the results I have obtained by using air mail in soliciting dormant accounts in Colombia, South America, I am very pleased indeed to inform you that I have been using your air mail service for this purpose for a long time already, and, needless to say, inasmuch as I continue using it I am perfectly satisfied with the results.

The saving in time in sending letters, drafts, etc., by air mail from New York to Gogota, Colombia South America, and vice versa, is so practical that compensate any postage expenses.

But the way that I have benefited the most by using air mail service is in sending most of the news and information to the various Colombian daily newspapers I represent. In this respect I have been congratulated by these newspapers for the promptness in conveying to them all information.

The air mail service has proven very effective indeed in soliciting dormant accounts in South America and for all business in general, of which I have been profiting ever since I started using your air mail service.

Just as soon as we learned of the air mail schedule for Brazil and the east coast of South America we dispatched a few letters to our people in Brazil by air mail, because we have found that the air mail service to South America via the west coast has been entirely satisfactory and has aided us in keeping in closer touch with our people in South America and yet not too expensive to use frequently.

As we have mail on practically every plane that leaves for South America, we would appreciate your advising us in the future regarding any changes in the schedule just as soon as they go into effect, as we have gotten into the habit of depending on our air mail letters reaching the hands of the people for whom they are intended on the very day which the air mail was scheduled to arrive.

Mr. W. S. BROWN,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Our companies are regular users of the air post facilities between this country and Latin America and find this service extremely valuable in our business relations with those countries. In fact, we scarcely know how we have been able to get along without it in the past.

Out of our experience, however, we should like to make a suggestion for possible improvement. We find that on letters originating in the Latin American countries, and particularly those of Central America, there is considerable carelessness on the part of post-office employees in the handing out of information concerning the amount of postage required, so that letters are often short of air mail postage.

In such cases they are forwarded by the foreign post offices by ordinary mail instead of by air mail, and the sender is unaware of what has occurred. Evidently there is no provision for collection of "postage due" at the receiving end.

This may be a condition over which your department has no direct control, but we have taken the liberty of bringing this subject to your attention in the hope that there may be some way in which troubles of this nature can be overcome. We are not the only sufferers from this trouble, for other American concerns with whom we are acquainted have experienced the same difficulties.

The air mail is a wonderful help to American business, and we note with great interest every extension of the service which takes place and trust that these improvements will continue. We appreciate the important part that your department has taken in the promotion of this service and it has our hearty support.

We have found the service satisfactory, and so far as we know mail reached destination in scheduled time.

This air-mail service has been of great benefit at times, such as where we have not been able to send shipping documents by regular mail. It is, of course, a well-known fact that many times it is very difficult to send shipping documents by the same steamer carrying the goods, and the use of the air mail in these particular instances is of course essential, as it avoids fines and other inconveniences at foreign customhouses, due to delay in receiving documents.

GUARANTY TRUST CO. OF NEW YORK,

PAN AMERICAN-GRACE AIRWAYS (Inc.),
New York, N. Y.

(Attention Mr. William M. North.)

GENTLEMEN: At the request of your Mr. North, who called on us a short while ago, we are pleased to write you with regard to air mail service.

We use the air mail extensively in connection with our international business relationships in South and Central America and the West Indies, and our banking correspondents in Latin America likewise use the service extensively in their communications to us.

The time element is an important one in the business world to-day and we believe the facility of air mail communication between the Americas has contributed much toward bringing the continents of the Western Hemisphere into closer contact and understanding.

In regard to specific phases of our dealings with Latin America in which the air mail service has impressed us as being of particular advantage, we would mention the following:

It frequently happens that shipments to various South American ports are made for which documents reach us only after the carrying steamers have sailed. If the consular documents are not in the hands of the proper parties at destination within a prescribed time after arrival of the steamer carrying the merchandise, the importer is often subject to a fine in order to obtain the merchandise. In such instances by sending the shipping documents by air mail we frequently have found it possible to place the papers in the hands of our correspondents before arrival of the carrying steamer at destination, and the expense of air mail is in such cases trivial compared to the loss which would otherwise have been suffered as a result of delay in dispatch of the documents.

We have also found the air mail service beneficial in handling the collection of exporters' drafts on Latin-American firms. Frequently, exporters desiring to amend their original instructions pertaining to their collection items find it convenient to have us despatch such instructions by air mail, where formerly because of the slowness of steamer-mail time it was considered necessary to send such instructions by cable, thereby incurring relatively higher expenses.

Another feature of air mail service that has impressed itself on us is in connection with obtaining credit reports on business houses in Latin America for the benefit of our exporting clients. Before the advent of air mail communication it was often necessary to rely upon brief information by cable which was followed by more detailed reports by the regular mail, which latter information was, of course, received only after considerable delay. The use of air mail in this connection has cut down the intervening period substantially.

We are pleased to give you the above information informally and with the understanding that it is not for publication.

DEAR SIRS: With reference to our conversation of last Thursday regarding the "Panagra" air postal arrangements, I have pleasure in testifying to the very excellent service I have obtained from this line since I commenced posting letters to England via that route in July last and, for your information, append a statement giving the dates of leaving Antofagasta and arrival in England of each of the 44 letters that I have sent that way during the period July 17 to December 21, from which you will observe that in many cases letters have reached England 12 days after leaving your city, and the average for the whole period is less than 14½ days. The longest time that any letter has taken was 22 days, and that occurred during the Christmas season at home, when it is quite likely that letters were delayed in delivery.

I would mention that prior to adopting the "Panagra" route, I was in the habit of sending air mails to England via the south, but can assure you that, from my own experience of the two lines, I have no intention of changing from Panagra's excellent service.

GENTLEMEN: In answer to your inquiry of the 5th instant, would state that we have taken advantage of your service for Colombia, Ecuador, and Panama, and occasionally for Chile. There are, of course, many advantages in the saving of time, and this is particularly noticeable when it is necessary to refer orders back to customers or representatives for confirmation of necessary changes. Handling by air mail usually saves time that can be reckoned in months and usually enables the customer to reorder much sooner than if shipment on the original order had been considerably delayed.

We also use air mail for Central America, the West Indies, Venezuela, and Brazil.

Our experience in using this service has been most satisfactory and we have no criticism to offer.

With best wishes for your continued success, we are

DEAR SIR: The letter of April 21, addressed to Mr. J. E. Kaiser, our traffic manager, has been given to this division for reply.

We are frank to state that while numerous benefits have been derived by our organization in this country and in Central and South America, through the extensive use of the air mail, we do not recall any instance of sufficient importance to warrant its being featured.

We use the air mail extensively when communicating with our agencies and branch offices in the countries to the south. In numerous instances we have found that using the air mail service for shipments of parts and supplies meant considerable to us not only in actual dollars but also in customers' good will.

If at any time in the future we should have a case such as you are interested in, we will most certainly be glad to pass it along.

Very truly yours,

W. A. BENTON,

(Attention Mr. J. D. MacGregor, vice president and general manager.)

GENTLEMEN: Referring to your inquiry of the 21st instant, we are pleased to state that we are very well satisfied with the air mail service which you have rendered between the United States and Montevideo, Uruguay, for the past five months.

In our business it is essential that documents be mailed on the same steamer carrying the shipment, especially if it happens to be a mail vessel, otherwise the consignees are subjected to a fine assessed by the Uruguayan customs.

At times, due to last-minute deliveries to a steamer, it is a physical impossibility to have the documents go forward on the same steamer with the goods, as many shippers require their documents and drafts to be negotiated through certain banks in this country, thus making it impossible to get the mail off in time.

Whenever such occasions arise we no longer anticipate any complaints from our clients abroad, inasmuch as the banks are authorized to dispatch the documents in connection with your air mail service and same are in the consignees' hands prior to the arrival of the vessel at the port of Montevideo.

In addition to the above, your service has also enabled us to eliminate cable expenses to a certain extent, especially when corrections are necessary on documents which have already been dispatched to destination. These corrections are sent via air mail and are in our client's hands prior to the receipt of the documents which are to be corrected.

Assuring you of our cooperation at all times, and trusting that you will be enabled to maintain your splendid service as heretofore, we are,

Yours very truly,

DEAR MR. NORTH: We are and have been for the past two years using your air mail service to some considerable extent in our more urgent correspondence, chiefly to the countries of South America.

We find that if opportunely mailed the additional speed obtained through air mail is most valuable and forms an important link between the more expensive transmission of messages by cable and the considerably slower means of regular post.

The members of our New York staff are using air mail whenever they feel it justified and are following air mail letters with a copy through the regular mails for confirmation purposes.

It is probable that with ultimate reduction of air mail rates there will be an increase approximately corresponding to that reduction in so far as this organization is concerned.

You may feel free to use this letter as an expression of our feeling on the subject as you see fit.

For your information, ever since the Pan American Airways inaugurated the air mail service to Central and South America we have been using this service continuously for quotation of our prices and collections and have found this service to be not only of great assistance to us in speeding up the service with the territories under our jurisdiction but also an important medium to reduce our cable expenses.

I had the pleasure to make a trip all through Central America last year with the Pan American Airways, and inasmuch as I plan to make a trip in the very near future to Panama, Trinidad, Barbados, and the Guianas, would appreciate it very much if you would furnish me with an up-to-date sailing schedule, as well as quotations of fares from Panama to Trinidad, the Guianas, etc.

DEAR SIR: Referring to your recent call, we have pleasure in placing on record that we are finding the air mail to South and Central America of increasing service to us. We use it in various ways. Sometimes we write by air mail for a reply by the same route. On other occasions, where details have to be sent for a prompt confirmation, we write by air mail for a reply by cable. When the details are required from the other end subject to a prompt reply from us, we reverse the procedure. By this combined use of cable and air mail we are able to get the maximum amount of service in the minimum time at the smallest cost.

(Attention J. D. MacGregor, vice president and general manager.)

GENTLEMEN: We have yours of April 29 and wish to state that the air mail has undoubtedly helped us in numerous ways. While we can not stress any one particular achievement and credit it to the air mail, we know that in every instance we have gotten payment of our drafts anywhere from 15 to 30 days quicker by the use of air mail than we did by ordinary mail, all of which means a saving in interest to us. Then again, in instances where we have missed the consignee mail, we have sent the documents by air mail and had them reach our trade in sufficient time to avoid a fine. Then, in instances where complaints of various natures in regard to our shipments have been handled through the air mail, it has been as rapid as the cable and we think more efficient, when you consider the more detailed information you can give in a letter sent by air mail as against the condensed information given in a cable.

We hope that eventually, when you have this air mail going to the height of perfection, that we may be able to eliminate our cable expense and depend upon the air mail entirely, and we believe this is the mark you should shoot at (the old saying is that if you shoot at the sky and miss, you will hit the roof, which is a pretty high mark at that) and that we may see the day not far distant when all these outlying sections of the world will be drawn very much closer or practically outside our own door by the use of air mail.

THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK,
New York, November 20, 1930.

HON. WALTER F. BROWN,
Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

SIR: It has occurred to me that it may be of interest for you to learn our viewpoint on the air mail service to South America. The writer has charge of the South American district division of the bank and direct supervision of our branches in Brazil, Uruguay, Argentina, and Chile. Prior to this time I have made my headquarters in Buenos Aires in order to maintain as close contact with the branches as possible. This required more or less of a duplicate supervisory organization in both New York and Buenos Aires. Through the development of the air mail and the opening of wireless telephone service between North and South America, we have found it unnecessary to maintain headquarters in Buenos Aires, and are now directing all supervisory activities from New York, and find that same can be done from here as efficiently and expeditiously as they were formerly done from Buenos Aires before the days of air mail, and with a great many added advantages in the way of coordination with other fields of bank activity.

I personally have watched the development of aviation activities in South America with a great deal of interest. I have lived in the countries of the South American Continent for the past 12 years and have felt considerable chagrin over the fact that English and European interests have very generally gained control of both railroad and steamship holdings that were not owned by the nationals of those various countries, and in almost all cases where transportation activities were in the hands of the nationals they were government owned. There seems to be very little opportunity for American interests to obtain any foothold whatsoever in the transportation picture, and I have felt that aviation was the answer as far as American interests are concerned, and have been very happy to see the activity that American concerns have shown in that regard.

Personal observation of the operations of the American air transportation companies has instilled in me a great admiration for the manner in which they are doing their job. I have personally flown over many of the routes and I have found, on the part of the pilots and mechanics, an esprit de corps which reminds one of the stories of the "pony express" of the old days—everything being sacrificed to the rule that "the mail must go through."

The development of the mail lines, and particularly the multiple service per week instead of the once-a-week service, is fast bringing about a new form of foreign exchange bills and where, in the past, transactions have been done on a basis of cable, sight or 90-day exchange, we are now developing an air mail rate of exchange, and this is peculiarly a dollar exchange and will eventually help to establish the American dollar as the basis for international transactions in South America.

Asking your indulgence for this long letter and assuring you of our hearty support of this great development, of particular interest to American and foreign trade, which your department has done so much to foster, I remain,

Yours very truly,

Mr. ROBERT H. PATCHIN,
W. R. Grace & Co., New York City.

DEAR MR. PATCHIN: I recently received your letter of November 11 and am pleased to submit additional data supplementary to my previous letter of November 10 relative to the valuable service we have been able to enjoy due to the facilities offered by the Pan American-Grace Airways.

Three weeks ago we were negotiating with a firm in Chile relative to their signing a contract which ran into many thousands of dollars. We were unable to send by cable to the directors of the Chilean house sufficient details to enable them to come to a decision and it was necessary for us to write a letter of considerable length. This letter was mailed in Philadelphia on Saturday, October 25, and within approximately two weeks' time we received from them their air mail reply. Had it been necessary to handle this exchange of correspondence in the ordinary course it would have taken at least six weeks, which would have probably resulted in our losing the opportunity of obtaining the business.

Some months ago various matters of great importance to our interests came up in the Argentine. It was urgent that immediate action be taken and to make this possible we had to forward various legal documents to our representative there. He cabled us the details he needed and we forwarded them by air mail on August 14. They were in his hands by August 21. If it had been necessary to forward these by boat the best we could have done was to send them on the steamer leaving New York, August 22, which arrived in Buenos Aires, September 9. By utilizing the Pan American-Grace Airways we saved 19 days.

The majority of our orders coming from Chile, Uruguay, and Argentina are coming forward by air mail. In most cases we are able to have the goods on the water on the way to the customers before the time that we would have received the order had it been sent by ordinary mail.

The Pan American-Grace Airways service is indeed speeding up the service we can give to customers, facilitating the transaction of business and through this medium of rapid communication is making it possible for us to better protect our interests.

GENTLEMEN: It is with great pleasure we take this opportunity of congratulating your entire organization on having inaugurated the air mail between this country and the west coast of South America. We find this service is becoming more valuable every week, as our men located in the various cities in Bolivia, Peru, and Chile are becoming accustomed to depending upon the rapid service which was impossible in the past, particularly due to the fact a complete story could not be economically conveyed by cable and consequently it was necessary to delay matters until the regular mail was received.

We feel your service is putting us in a better position to properly develop our business relations with our southern sister republics. There are numerous occasions when matters can be carefully and diplomatically conveyed by air mail which will greatly strengthen the friendship with our valuable clients in the various territories you so completely cover. It is, of course, impossible for us to definitely establish the actual value of this service in dollars and cents; but, on the other hand, there is no question but what this service is extremely valuable to all concerns doing business in South America, and we sincerely hope nothing will interfere with the continuation of the American air mail to and from the west coast of South America.

Thanking you very kindly for the close cooperation you have given us in the past, we remain, 122 East Forty-second Street, New York City.

GENTLEMEN: We beg to acknowledge receipt of your esteemed favor of April 28, requesting an expression of opinion from us about the air mail service between the United States and South America.

It is very difficult for us to give you at the present time any particular case from which we have derived any special benefits through the use of your service. Generally speaking, however, we have found the service absolutely reliable. Undoubtedly the saving of time, if measured in dollars and cents, would show the advisability of continually using this service. In our line of business we find that it pays to send samples by air mail to certain countries like Argentina, Chile, Colombia, and Ecuador, where the competition is greater, so that the one who has the sample first to show to the customers is able to obtain larger orders.

We are every day using more and more your service for this purpose, as well as for important mail, and it has proven time and again its advantages in the saving of time when time is of prime importance.

DEAR MR. MACGREGOR: Your letter of May 1 recalls the interesting days Mrs. Coffin and I traveled in your company in Bolivia and Peru some 16 months ago. I am sorry that I have no particular interesting experiences to report regarding the air mail, which we use freely.

POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: We have been approached by a representative of the Pan American-Grace Airways (Inc.), who is anxious to have our opinion of the air mail service being rendered by them in both directions between the United States and countries on the west coast of South America. We were also requested by them to give you the benefit of our observations, and we are pleased to state that it quite frequently happens in the conduct of our business it is necessary to avail ourselves of this service.

We have always found same to be an invaluable aid to us in addressing our customers on matters relating to the collection and payment of accounts and also in obtaining remittances in these various countries covering export shipments from New York.

It also happens that at times we are unable to place our shipping documents aboard the cargo steamer before it sails from New York, and in such instances we forward same through the medium of the air mail, as it is necessary to have these shipping documents at destination of the merchandise within a certain time after the unloading of the goods. Otherwise, storage charges accrue and also fines in certain countries, and we are pleased to state that this service has always been found reliable and satisfactory, and we consider that our using this air mail service has resulted in a certain saving to us.

Very truly yours,

GENTLEMEN: Your valued communication of the 19th ultimo received, having come to hand to-day the copy of the air mail map issued by your associate company, Pan American Airways (Inc.).

I assure you that this map is of great value to me, and wish to thank you for your courtesy in the matter. The expeditious service being rendered by your company is indeed quite noticeable and appreciated by those in urgent need of fast and dependable air mail communication with the South American countries.

Thanking you again for your attention, I am,

Very truly yours,

DEAR SIRS: Since the inauguration of your air mail service to Central America, Chile, Argentina, and Uruguay, we have availed ourselves regularly of this new means of communication. The results obtained have been most beneficial to our many interests, due to the great saving in time in handling matters of importance which can not be accomplished so economically nor satisfactorily by cable communication or steamer mail, as heretofore.

While our air mail postage bills have been high, we believe that an economy has been realized in the saving of cable expenses which were very high formerly, due to the fact that many matters had to be treated by cable rather than steamer mail, where time was the important factor.

We have especially benefited by the semiweekly service on the west coast of South America, and take this opportunity to express our appreciation of the excellent service your company has maintained in these mail routes.

Very truly yours,

The Hon. WILLIAM F. BROWN,
Postmaster General of the United States,

MY DEAR MR. POSTMASTER GENERAL: Reports from the members of our organization abroad, as well as from other sources, attach considerable importance and, indeed, increasing importance to the facilities for travel and communication by established air routes—particularly American owned and controlled air routes—in Central and South America. I am informed and convinced that the success and, to some extent, the survival of American business abroad is contingent upon the continuance and further development of air transport in the hands of American interests.

Having been advised that the development of air transport to and in Central and South America has been substantially fostered by the United States Government through the medium of postal contracts, and believing that you must be interested in the value of the services thus far fostered, I am offering you this voluntary testimony of its usefulness to us.

Very truly yours,

Hon. HIRAM BINGHAM,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR BINGHAM: Having been informed that you are interested in the question of American air service to and in Central and South America, I am taking the liberty of addressing you for the purpose of offering testimony to the usefulness and value of that service.

Foreign commerce is, of necessity, of a highly competitive nature. When those European nations, whom we meet in competition abroad, began establishing air routes for passenger and mail service in and to Latin America, many of the representatives of our company, as well as others, were filled with consternation. When, however, American-controlled lines were established to provide facilities for mail and passenger travel between the United States and various points in Central and South America, and when those lines developed and maintained excellence of service, which has since come to be regarded as indispensable, we were encouraged to continue and renew our efforts abroad.

It is my understanding that this air service is, in some degree, fostered by the United States Government through the medium of postal contracts. I feel that those instrumental in bringing this about should be appraised of the effectiveness and usefulness of the service thus far established.

Very truly yours,

L. A. OSBORNE,

(Attention Mr. J. D. MacGregor, vice president and general manager.)

With reference to your letter of May 15, inviting our attention to the use that some mailers are making of the air mail to South America. This is a practice we have made use of ever since the inauguration of air mail service to Central and South America.

Our business in Central and South America is done through 28 agencies and large plants located at Sao Paulo, Brazil, and Buenos Aires, Argentina, and we are making consistent daily use of the air mail to these points. Especially do we use air mail to those points where there has been a very decided slowing up in business.

We are absolutely familiar with this air service operated by your company and are thoroughly satisfied with the results obtained, as it is bringing us in closer contact by from 5 to 15 days than occurs by the ordinary mail of similar service.

We hope to see additional service on the foreign route No. 10 road as soon as the Post Office Department can be induced to make the necessary provision.

We trust this outlines the proposition as requested in your letter.

WOODROW WILSON—ADDRESS BY NEWTON D. BAKER

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address by former Secretary of War Newton D. Baker, delivered at the tomb of Woodrow Wilson, in Washington Cathedral on April 13, 1932, the birthday of Thomas Jefferson.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There are, in every country, places which have come to embody great traditions; their very names sum up epochs and to them succeeding generations repair to touch again, with their spirits, the emblems of great and triumphant faiths. Often such places are significant because they evoke noble personalities and we gather there knowing that we shall not see the face or hear the voice of the great dead, but sure that memory will reassociate our spirits with theirs and revive our flagging faith, as by an emanation from a faith that never failed. We rekindle our spirits with embers from the altars where their ashes lie and in the presence of the reminders of their mortality meditate upon their immortal services to their fellowmen.

An American approaches with reverence the tomb of any man who has held the historic office of President of the United States, for each in his turn recalls a period of struggle and growth, each marks some part of the rising hope with which our country saw its own liberty made more broad and secure, its philosophy of freedom, by subtle adaptations, made more serviceable to the happiness of men everywhere. But among these there are places of especial sanctity, and already St. Albans is moving to take its place with Mount Vernon, Monticello, Nashville, and Springfield, shrines which summon memories of the great ordeals of democracy, met—it seems to us providentially—by great spiritual forces.

It was only yesterday, eight years ago, that we laid all that was mortal of him here to rest. Only 11 years have passed since he laid down the Presidency. We are too near him to measure his place in the great background of history. We are yet too much under the spell of the inspiration he gave us to make detached estimates. His spirit is still mightily at work in the hearts and minds of men; years must show the harvest of his sowing.

But those of us who lived the brave years of Mr. Wilson's public career can not be mistaken in our belief that they were years of tremendous moment; we can not be mistaken in our belief that his spirit dominated our age; and we can set down some testimony as to his vision, his lofty singleness of purpose, and the intrepidity of his spirit which will help to explain, even if it can not undertake to measure, the work he did.

It ought, at the outset, to be noted that Mr. Wilson's political education differed from that of any other man who has come to the Presidency. Almost without any other exception, our Presidents have been men of affairs, taking the world as they found it and occupying themselves in its business according to rules and practices already established. An occasional military figure has slipped into the Presidency without previous political experience, but for the most part they have been men not only of strong political faith but of long-continued partisan allegiance, graduated into the highest position after service in other legislative or executive places, and so imbued with the traditions of their party and allied to the party's working captains. Mr. Wilson, on the other hand, had lived the life of the scholar, breathing the detached air of academic surroundings. He was a party man in the sense that he had a philosopher's appreciation of the fundamental faith upon which his party was founded, a faith only rarely set forth with any fullness in its platforms. His friends and intimates were college professors and college presidents. His career as a student began at the very time when the scientific spirit and the research method were first beginning to be applied in the study of sociology and politics, and throughout his career as a teacher he and his fellows were organized into great associations of scholars who were busy reexamining and often rejecting traditional beliefs and theories in economics and politics and substituting for wise saws and ancient maxims new doctrines and new rules based upon data compiled by observing the phenomena and experience of modern life. Most of his contemporaries in other fields accepted the ancient order without question and were busy gatherin its fruits. He and his academic associates, however, occupied themselves assigning recent occurrences their true place in a great historic order, discovering tendencies and changes by comparisons over great periods of time and questioning whether ancient forms and procedures were elastic enough to contain and direct the boundless new energies which civilization was developing. This gave him the detached point of view of the scholar, prevented him from having any illusions about the mere accumulation of wealth as the measure of enduring success, and, as his own field of scholarship was politics, he was equipped with knowledge and freed from prejudice in that special department of human affairs which was to be the scene of his whole public activity. It is difficult to imagine better training for a man called to leadership at a moment when the old order was changing and when the thing we call modern civilization was at a parting of the ways.

It was noteworthy, too, that while Mr. Wilson's career as a teacher brought him often into contact with groups and organizations of men of affairs, the major part of his life was spent addressing young men not yet caught up in the trammels of convention and tradition, not yet disillusioned by experience, still having the courage to take the long look, the naïveté, if you care to call it that, to believe in the possibility of improving conditions by conscious personal effort. Now, the happy effect of constant association with the young is to prolong the best part of our own youth. Successful teachers succeed perhaps because they have preserved the curiosity, the candor, and the courage of children. From this field of labor, from these associations, with these intellectual habits, Mr. Wilson went forth for years to various parts of the country making political addresses in which the virtue always present was challenge and from which the vice always absent was complaisance. Up to the time of his election, these addresses, made with increasing frequency and becoming more daring in their directness, show that Mr. Wilson remained consistently loyal to a set of principles historically derived, but that he always remained elastic as to method, in deference to the immense delicacy of the complicated social order in which they were to be applied. In his own mind there was always present a standard by which he tested the soundness and probable success of any program—will it bring young men eagerly trooping about it? He had no faith in policies which merely sought to protect and perpetuate established interests, as he had no faith in a policy which merely sought to attack established interests. His own philosophy was that every question had to be viewed from a democratic standpoint—that is, how does it affect all the people?—and that in attempting to answer that question too much reliance could not be placed in the judgment, however sincere, of those whose own immediate interests were involved in the issue under discussion.

It is possible to pick out from addresses by Mr. Wilson statements upon practically every political and economic question then or now of importance, and in retrospect they seem to have a prescience and validity perhaps not fully appreciated at the time. He declared that the old order was changing; that the political mechanisms devised to maintain popular control had become so complicated that in effect they defeated the very object of their creation; that many of the economic policies which had been at the very base of national legislation for a period of years had exhausted their virtue; that the tariff, once a policy of protection, had become a practice of patronage; that the banking system devised immediately after the Civil War had become obsolete and inadequate; that at the close of the Spanish-American War the United States had entered the family of great nations with international responsibilities and interests, and that thenceforth our life as a people had to be lived in a world which would be ruled either by cooperation or conflict. Thus his mind constantly dwelt in the higher fields of political speculation.

The people seemed to have understood him perfectly, the politicians not at all, and his nomination was not a machine-made product resulting from the traditional mechanisms of party control but one of those reassuring instances, which sometimes happen, when a tide swelling up from the minds of inarticulate people drowns out the noisy gears of mere political machinery. The merely practical politicians, the morning after the Baltimore convention, were in much the same state of mind as their forerunners were after the Chicago convention which nominated Lincoln. They no doubt asked themselves in both cases, "Now that we have this strange and unaccountable person on our hands, what can we do with him," and in both cases the answer was the same. They did nothing with him whatever, but he did everything with them, for both men were leaders with fixed principles, with vision, and with inflexible wills.

The consequence of all this was the instant assertion of a new type of leadership. The newly inaugurated President met the Congress with a program which had the orderly precision of a synopsis for a course of college lectures. He proceeded, step by step, to proposed reconstruction of the economic life of the Nation, and it was a program which did not admit giving the tenth lecture before the fifth. In the accomplishment of these reforms the President invited the cooperation of the Congress. He was not unsympathetic with the difficulties which individual members of Congress experienced from sectional and local feeling and interest, but his own largeness of view and his own courage "comforted the failing." Here at last was a man who was not politically afraid and here also was a man whose capacity for clear speech was unlimited. The White House became the lecture desk and the Princeton class, in the theory of government, became the whole people of the United States. The same sort of clarity and the same sort of candor characterized the President's utterances to the people, and the response from the people was the same sort of comprehension and the same sort of courage. The net result of all this was the passage of a great series of constructive economic measures any one of which would have been impossible under any other kind of leadership, each of which was possible because of his leadership. This is no place to enumerate, much less to appraise, these economic measures. If we can but discern the qualities of character and education in the leadership which made them possible, the whole present purpose will be served.

In like fashion the quality of his leadership is made manifest by a consideration of his attitude toward international questions. There was the same freedom from traditional restraints in his thinking, the same realization of the newness of the age and of the necessity for new procedures and even new principles. Here as in domestic affairs he moved with courage as an attitude and faith as a foundation, but here, too, he brought the scholar's passionate search for truth and the scientist's love of order. In the early days of his first administration he took new and higher ground in the field of our international relations and declined to be dominated by the theories of national interest which, up to that time, were accepted as the basis of national action. In those early days it is possible to find the seed which later flowered into the doctrine which was his outstanding gift to the future of mankind. This doctrine was a mere application to the actions of nations of the Christian ethic, long accepted as the ideal of individual action, that he who would be greatest among men must achieve that eminence by his service to his fellows.

From Machiavelli down to the most recent times the rules of individual morality were frankly discarded by political philosophers as having no application to the actions of states. The result was an obvious anarchy in the international relations of the world, with secret diplomacy, offensive and defensive alliances, forcible partitions of weak states, and a world armed to the teeth for aggression. The traditional answer to the perils of such a situation was more and more delicate balances of power, but the efficacy of that answer collapsed when a war involving the whole world destroyed not only the lives and fortunes of countless millions of men but destroyed also the frail materialistic philosophy upon which it had been attempted to build a permanent social order. The World War was not only the greatest catastrophe ever brought upon the race by its own folly, but it revealed the fundamental insecurity of any social order built entirely upon force; and if it be true, as it doubtless is true, that the greatest loss the world sustained was its loss of faith, there is at least this comfort to be extracted from it: That the thing we lost faith in was the thing which it had at last become dangerous to believe. This was the supreme challenge of the new era—could it find the basis of a new and better faith.

Fortunately, three years elapsed before the United States was caught up in the universal disaster. During that time we realized that the accident of geography as well as our democratic institutions had set us apart and in some way made us different from other nations, but it was Mr. Wilson who found and stated the fundamental truths involved, and in a great series of messages and addresses he pointed out that our highest mission as a people would be to serve those whose differences from us had brought them to such tragic suffering. For three years he prepared this greatest nation in the modern world for a healing mission. His great hope was that by keeping ourselves free from selfish purpose we might ultimately not only bind up the wounds of the world but teach it a higher and a better way. There is not in the political literature of any people a loftier conception or a nobler hope than he gave us in those years.

Then the war came to us and immense mobilizations of the man power and material and financial resources of the Nation took place. The general attention was diverted from missions of service to fields of battle; the paramount duty of that hour was to create and support our great army overseas, and there was no faltering in the performance by the President of this stern and tragic duty. But the tragedy of the war served only to lengthen the vision and elevate the hope of the man who had become the undisputed leader of the free peoples of the world. There can be no doubt that the added weight of the fresh and fearless army of American youth shifted the balance to the Allied side; there can be no doubt that the financial and industrial strength of America sustained the almost desperate cause of the nations now associated with us who had long borne the brunt of the struggle; but the victory which was won on Armistice Day was, in its more enduring sense, a victory of ideas and ideals. Readjustments will be made in territorial dispositions and men will forget the material gains which resulted from the mere triumph of arms, but the world will never forget the struggle of a nation moved by no selfish purpose and led by a statesman who dared to foresee as the result of the conflict a new world in which the principle of liberty would be safe, the principle of justice established, and conference, arbitration, conciliation, and adjudication substituted in international disputes for the arbitrament of war.

We must not allow ourselves to be dismayed or deceived by the difficulties which faced the peace conference in Paris nor by the solutions of those difficulties, which time is showing to have been inadequate or erroneous. I am one of those who ventures to believe that some day Mr. Wilson's phrase "peace without victory" will be accepted as one of the most profound and righteous wishes ever expressed by him or any other statesman. The conference at Paris demonstrated that the sense of victory does not create a favorable atmosphere for the construction of just and enduring peace. The portions of the treaty of Versailles that were dictated by the spirit of victory are largely the parts of that treaty which still obstruct peace. Nations, like men, have emotions, are sensitive to hurts to their pride, and in moments of passion submerge their better selves. The only sort of peace which can endure must come from a recognition of virtues as springs of national action as well as guides for individual behavior. The future peace of the world can not be secured by processes which attain diplomatic successes and inflict diplomatic defeats, which inflame nations with a sense of aggrandizement or humiliate them with a sense of wounded pride. Mr. Wilson's vision of the modern world made safe rests upon the establishment of peace-time agencies which, working in the open, summon the intelligence and conscience of disinterested peoples to conciliate controversies before they have been fanned into conflagrations. It has been said of Mr. Wilson that he was a dreamer, with this difference, that he made his dreams come true. To a remarkable degree this observation applies to the bold reforms he brought about in our domestic policies and in the start he gave to the kind of institutions necessary to rationalize international relations, but his long vision of a reordered world is too profound and ultimate to be speedily accomplished. It involves a change in the psychology of the race as well as in the technique of diplomacy, it rests upon a larger diffusion of knowledge and a deeper penetration of culture, it can be accomplished only by slow steps with hesitations and falterings as the nobler ideal encounters obstinate prejudices and arouses historic fears.

To a larger degree than we commonly realize, progress in these matters has been made since the World War; and if there was at one time a disposition to discount the thing called idealism, that disposition has been chastened by our experiences of very recent years, of which all the lessons are not yet clear but which surely seem to vindicate afresh the inadequacy of a purely materialistic foundation for a modern society. These lean and anxious years seem too to show again the completeness with which the life of any modern nation is integrated with that of the nations of the world, a fact which has followed from the growth of international trade and finance, and which, in effect, extends a nation's frontiers beyond its geographical limits until they coincide with its interests in far-flung parts of the world. Implications of the dangers and of the opportunities of this new situation were implicit in Mr. Wilson's vision of the new era and in his realization that the end of the old era had come.

This 13th day of April is the birthday of Thomas Jefferson. I am speaking in the shade of the monument to Woodrow Wilson. Between the lives of these two men, throughout our national history, flows the current of a democratic philosophy, universal in its scope, propounded by the sage of Monticello. From his day until now his philosophy has battled for the dominance of the world. The tide of its advance has sometimes been retarded; here and there it has met the obstacle of new conditions, and has had to readjust itself in periods of doubt and hesitation, but each obstacle has but served to raise the tide and render its ultimate advance the more irresistible. Certain triumphant applications of it have followed each of our temptations to discard it. In the life of Andrew Jackson, as in that of Abraham Lincoln, it received fresh vindications, and in the whole of its great history it has had no more superb statement than from Woodrow Wilson, no other prophet has with greater vision extended its reach.

Again we have fallen upon days of doubt and disillusionment. Again we need the scholar's detachment and the leader's voice. For the moment we can but say to this great soldier, "Sleep on. The army which you led is still advancing, the acceptance of the doctrines you preached is still growing, the ideals you cherished are still vital, and the happier world toward which all of our faces are turned will recognize you as one of the great architects of its hope."

ALABAMA SENATORIAL CONTEST

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 199), reported by Mr. GEORGE and Mr. BRATTON from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as follows:

Resolved, That JOHN H. BANKHEAD is hereby declared to be a duly elected Senator of the United States from the State of Alabama for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1931, and is entitled to a seat as such.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Austin	Cutting	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Bailey	Dale	Kean	Schall
Bankhead	Dickinson	Kendrick	Sheppard
Barbour	Dill	La Follette	Shipstead
Barkley	Fletcher	Lewis	Shortridge
Bingham	Frazier	Logan	Smith
Black	George	McGill	Smoot
Blaine	Glass	McKellar	Steiwer
Borah	Glenn	McNary	Stephens
Bratton	Gore	Metcalf	Thomas, Idaho
Brookhart	Hale	Moses	Thomas, Okla.
Broussard	Hastings	Neely	Townsend
Bulow	Hatfield	Norbeck	Trammell
Byrnes	Hayden	Norris	Vandenberg
Capper	Hebert	Nye	Walcott
Caraway	Howell	Oddie	Watson
Connally	Hull	Pittman

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] are unavoidably detained from the Senate.

I also desire to announce that the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is absent by reason of illness.

Mr. GLASS. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is still detained from the Senate in attendance upon the disarmament conference at Geneva.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, it is my intention to discuss the two phases of the Bankhead-Heflin contest separately. First, I wish to address my remarks to the attack which has been made upon the Alabama primary and to the position taken by some of the Senators as to its effect upon the election of a Senator in Alabama. We come before the Senate with that proposition in a strange and peculiar way. The objection is made by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] in his minority views, and yet the Senator from Delaware declines to take the position on the floor, in line with what would seem to be the recommendation which he places before the Senate, that it should affect the seating of the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. Bankhead].

On yesterday, in response to my inquiries, the Senator from Delaware declined to comment at all upon what he thought should be the effect of the alleged illegality of the Alabama primary and as to whether or not it should result in the unseating of the junior Senator from Alabama. We, therefore, must be led to the conclusion that this part of the views of the minority was placed in the RECORD not because the Senator from Delaware believed that it should result in the unseating of the junior Senator from Alabama, but because the thought possibly occurred to him that there might be some in the Senate to whom this particular argument would appeal. In other words, it is the same proposition that we have heard sometimes with reference to tariff legislation. If the proponents of a certain measure can not obtain the votes by one method, they try another, even if it be necessary to advocate something which personally they do not favor.

Mr. President, the assertion is made that, by reason of the resolution adopted by the Democratic executive committee of Alabama, the primary in that State was void, and that, therefore, no legal right arose in any nominee of that primary to have his name placed upon the ticket. That being conceded by those who present the proposition, since such nominee could not have his name legally placed upon the ticket, it would naturally follow that he could not be legally elected.

In the outset I might state that both the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. Bankhead] and myself took a position within the party in Alabama opposed to the particular resolution of the Democratic executive committee. The committee, however, adopted the resolution; every member of that committee who voted for that resolution and submitted himself to the Democrats of Alabama was renominated for his position, and every member of that committee who ran for any other office in Alabama who submitted himself to the Democratic voters of that State was nominated by the Democrats. We therefore start out with the natural assumption that the rule was approved by the Democrats of Alabama.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand the Senator to say that the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. Bankhead] opposed the adoption of the resolution adopted by the Democratic State committee?

Mr. BLACK. He did so in an open statement in the press. That was before the resolution was adopted. After the resolution was adopted, the junior Senator from Alabama took the position that the committee had acted, and that he was bound by the resolution. I took the position that it should be tested in the courts. It went to the courts in two cases. The first was in the nature of an injunction against the holding of the primaries, which petition was filed by Judge Horace C. Wilkinson, who is the attorney for the contestant in this case. The Supreme Court of Alabama held in that case that an entire election or primary could not be enjoined by a voter. I assume that every lawyer will readily conclude that when the court took that action it necessarily implied on their part the belief, as was later demonstrated in the Lett case, that the primary was not wholly void. Of course, if the primary had been wholly void, as has been suggested, then the probability is that the court would have taken another position.

Later another case went to the court, the case of Lett against Dennis. Bear in mind that the question raised was that section 612 of the Alabama Code, as construed by me and as construed by others, meant that the qualifications for voters and the candidates should be the same. A different qualification was set up in the Democratic primary; a different qualification was set up in the Republican primary in Chilton County; there was a variation in the rules provided; but the underlying fundamental principle was in both, the rule in the Alabama Democratic primary being that no candidate could offer for office in that primary without stating that he had voted the Democratic ticket in the last general election or that he had not in the election openly opposed the nominees or candidates on that ticket. Such a qualification was not imposed upon the voters.

The rule as prescribed by the Republican committee of Chilton County provided that a candidate must file a certificate under oath stating whether or not he had supported the Republican Party ticket in the last general election. No such test was imposed upon the voter. So, in each instance, we find that both the Republican Party and the Democratic Party promulgated rules prescribing different tests and qualifications for the candidates of those parties than were imposed upon the voter; in other words, there was a restriction upon the candidates in both parties which was not imposed upon the voters.

The Republican resolution was taken to the Supreme Court of Alabama by a proper legal proceeding, which was mandamus. A man sought to be a candidate and he took the position that a different qualification had been required of him than on the voters, that a more stringent test had been imposed upon him in that he was compelled to swear to something that a voter would not have to swear to in order to enter the primaries. That case, as I recall, was presented by Mr. Arthur B. Chilton, who later appeared in the record here as one of the representatives of the contestant in this case. The supreme court held in that case, as was admitted by Judge Wilkinson, that the political party had an absolute right to fix reasonable qualifications for the voters. It did not go to the extent of determining what was reasonable and what was not reasonable, except to hold that in that case the resolution of the Republican committee was a reasonable regulation, and that it was the uniform rule that parties had the right to exact tests of party loyalty.

That being true, we have an opinion from the Supreme Court of Alabama, which the attorney for the contestant accepted and admitted to be binding in this case, that the Democratic committee acted within its legal right in requiring every candidate in that primary to file a certificate under oath that he had both supported the Democratic ticket and had not openly or publicly opposed the nominees of that party.

So we have advanced this far with the knowledge that in so far as concerned the action of the Democratic committee in excluding Senator Heflin, who could not make the oath, it acted within its legal rights.

That being true, let me also call attention to the fact that it has been all the time insisted upon in this case, in order to reach the conclusion that Senator Bankhead was not the nominee of a legal primary, that the resolution was wholly and completely void. But that can not be, because the Supreme Court of Alabama has held—and I insist that in so far as this case is concerned, the Supreme Court of Alabama is the supreme tribunal of this Nation—that the resolution was not completely void, and that, if it had any effect beyond that which the committee should have provided, it was merely to admit voters into the primary under the resolution who might be automatically barred by section 612.

That being true, let us see what is the result. Let us assume, as the attorney for the contestant insists, that the resolution, because it required a certain test for a candidate, automatically applied that test to a voter. What would be the result? If a voter had presented himself to the election managers and clerks and some one had asked, "Did you vote the Democratic ticket in 1928, or did you openly oppose the nominees of the Democratic Party?" and if he declared that he had opposed them, that voter would have been subject to challenge. Assuming, as I stated, that the contention is correct that the barring of the candidate automatically bars the voter, the remedy was by challenging the voters who had been improperly admitted into the primary.

Now, going a step farther, after the courts had acted, the record shows that the contestant in this case——

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he leaves that point?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. The effect of the action, if it was illegal, was not to vitiate the primary but to permit persons to vote who otherwise would not have been entitled to vote.

Mr. BLACK. It was to have a provision in the resolution which would permit them to vote; but if the law intervened, and made it illegal for that particular one to vote, then that voter would have been subjected to challenge.

Mr. BRATTON. Of course. The point I made, however, was that the effect of the resolution was to enlarge the right of suffrage beyond the scope permitted by the Alabama law.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. BRATTON. In other words, it merely permitted persons to vote who, under a strict interpretation of the law, if that view is correct, were not entitled to vote.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is absolutely correct. If the construction placed upon the statute by the attorney for the contestant was correct, it would have restricted the voters to those who filed affidavits and sent them to the chairman of the Democratic executive committee that they had not opposed the Democratic nominees in the last primary.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Did I understand the Senator from Alabama to indicate that the Supreme Court of the State of Alabama had really determined the legal proposition involved here?

Mr. BLACK. The Supreme Court of Alabama determined exactly this: I can not answer the Senator with a "yes" or "no," but I will state exactly what was judicially determined. They judicially announced that in so far as the resolution affecting the candidate was concerned, the committee was within its rights. They said that this candidate from Chilton County could not complain if they had gone farther than they should with reference to the voters. That was the holding of the court.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I am one of those who entertain the view that the Senate has the right to inquire into the legality of the primary where that primary has to do with the qualifications of the candidate who is asking a seat in this body; and, frankly, the question which disturbs me most in this controversy is whether Senator Bankhead's name was legally upon the ticket by reason of the action which was taken with reference to the question of qualifications. As I see the matter, unless his name was legally upon the ticket, he could not be a candidate; and I hope the Senator will address himself particularly to that matter for the benefit of some of us who are interested in it.

Mr. BLACK. I have sent for the case of Lett against Dennis, which I shall read when it comes, which pointedly holds that section 612 gave to the Democratic committee or to the Republican committee the absolute right to fix the qualifications of the candidates; and it was under a rule of the committee, adopted in line with that, that Senator Bankhead's name was upon the ticket. When I receive the opinion, I shall read it for the benefit of the Senator and of the Senate. In the meantime, however, until it arrives I will advance one step farther.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question at that juncture?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Was it not conceded by counsel for the contestant that the committee had the power to fix any qualifications for a candidate that the committee desired to fix?

Mr. BLACK. It was conceded by the counsel for the contestant at about seven or eight different places in the record that the committee did act within its rights in fixing the qualifications for its candidates.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I point out to the Senator from Idaho, who made the inquiry, that on page 3 of the report submitted by Senators GEORGE and BRATTON from the Committee on Privileges and Elections I find this statement:

> On page 126 of hearings, Part I, counsel for contestant stated in oral argument:
> "I have conceded, gentlemen, that the committee may fix any qualifications for a candidate they want to."

May I add that that concession by counsel for Mr. Heflin follows the rule set up in the Lett case.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct. I have the Lett case now, and I will call the Senator's attention first to this feature of the resolution:

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BLACK. I do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Before the Senator starts reading from that case, will he permit a question from me as to his own view?

Mr. BLACK. I stated my views while the Senator was out, and I am stating my views now.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I had reference to what has been published a number of times, Mr. President.

Mr. BLACK. I understand what the Senator has reference to, and I have already stated my view.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. What I am getting at is this: I should like to know from the Senator from Alabama—because I have not heard him say anything about it yet—whether or not the views attributed to him, published in the report submitted by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], are true; whether he took the position that the committee in Alabama had acted beyond any authority that it had in this matter.

Mr. BLACK. If the Senator had been here when I began, he would have heard me make that exact statement.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I was absent. That is the reason why I was asking the Senator now if he would be good enough to reiterate what he said then.

Mr. BLACK. I do not care to reiterate what I said. The Senator can read it in the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does the Senator take a different position now than that which he took then?

Mr. BLACK. The Senator does not. The Senator has not. The Senator took the same position then that he takes now. He took the same position in the election in Alabama, all over the State, that he takes now.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I heard what the Senator said this morning. Is not that contrary to the position he took when this resolution was adopted by the Democratic committee in Alabama?

Mr. BLACK. The Senator knows that it is not, if he heard what I said.

Now, Mr. President, going to the subject to which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] referred, in the first place, if the part of the resolution with reference to the voter failed to include sufficient qualifications, and if it be true that fixing the qualifications for the voter automatically fixed the qualifications for the candidate, then that part of the resolution would have been mere surplusage, because the law would govern. It would not have affected, or according to the decision of the court did not affect, the entire resolution, because the supreme court has held that the committee had an absolute right to fix the qualifications of the candidate, as I shall now read (129 Southern, p. 36:)

It is further suggested that under section 612 of the code, the qualification of the voter is automatically fixed the same as the candidate and that the resolution in question is violative thereof. But that section is not in any manner here involved and a consideration of this insistence as to its proper construction unnecessary. Petitioner seeks relief as a candidate and not otherwise. Any matter affecting those not candidates would in no wise alter petitioner's status.

We have concluded the standard of qualification for the candidate is properly and legally fixed by the resolution, and petitioner's argument would but result in an enlargement by operation of law of the qualifications of those not candidates. With this, he is not concerned, and is therefore in no position to question as it would not affect the requirements of the resolution as to himself. His rights are to be determined by the fixed standard as to candidates, and the only statutory provision applicable thereto is section 672 of the code.

In other words, the court held that the resolution prescribing a different qualification did not make the election void, because, if it had made it void, mandamus would not have been a remedy. There would have been no remedy to apply for a void election.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Am I correct in assuming that it is admitted all through the record that this committee had the absolute power to fix the qualifications of the candidates?

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct. It was admitted by the attorney for the contestant.

Mr. BORAH. It is also true, is it, that the supreme court decided in this particular case that the committee had the power to fix the qualifications of candidates?

Mr. BLACK. The supreme court decided in the Chilton County case, which I have just read, under the resolution which I defined a few moments ago——

Mr. BORAH. That they had the power to fix the qualifications of candidates?

Mr. BLACK. They did.

Mr. BORAH. The supreme court did not decide what effect the balance of the resolution had upon the voter?

Mr. BLACK. The supreme court said that he was not the proper one to pass upon that.

Mr. BORAH. But it settled the question as to the candidate?

Mr. BLACK. It settled it finally and decisively and is so admitted by the attorney for contestant.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The supreme court in the Lett case held that the candidate could not raise the question as to the effect upon the voter.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to read from a part of the decision of the Senate in the contested case of Senator Mayfield, from Texas. The Senate unanimously, as I understand—I may be mistaken; it may not have been a unanimous vote—but I have understood that Mr. Mayfield was unanimously seated.

Mr. ASHURST. He was.

Mr. BLACK. There was a unanimous report of the committee on both sides. In that contest the question was raised that is raised here, and the committee of the Senate decided as follows:

The contestant complained of the law and practice in Texas which prevented any member of a party from voting at a primary election who had not voted, if he voted at all, for the regular party ticket at the last preceding general election.

It was claimed by the contestant that except for this rule Mayfield would not have been nominated at the primary. Similar regulations are in force in other States, and your committee has no doubt as to the power of a party or of a State to make such regulations if they see fit so to do.

Mr. President, in so far as the Senate is concerned, it will be noted that it has passed upon this exact proposition; but let us advance to the next step.

Considering, now, that the primary was held, is it the duty of the Senate now, even if the primary should have been wholly and thoroughly illegal, to unseat Senator Bankhead because his name was placed upon the ticket from what would be claimed to be an illegal primary?

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the Senator goes into that, I want to get the matter clear in my mind. There is no doubt, as I gather from what the Senator says, that the party committee in Alabama had the power and the right to prescribe qualifications for a candidate in the Democratic primary. There is no doubt about that, is there?

Mr. BLACK. The statute so provided.

Mr. LOGAN. And the Alabama Supreme Court has so held?

Mr. BLACK. It has.

Mr. LOGAN. If that is true, does it not follow, as a matter of course, that Senator Bankhead's name was undoubtedly legally on the primary ballot? There can be no doubt of that, can there?

Mr. BLACK. I think the Senator is absolutely correct about that.

Mr. LOGAN. Then one step farther. The only difficulty that could arise would be that illegal votes were cast in the Alabama primary, under the resolution of the committee?

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. LOGAN. Who would have the right to raise the question about that except in a contest over the nomination, by some Democratic voter or some Democratic candidate? Could some one other than a member of the Democratic Party raise that question at all?

Mr. BLACK. It could be just as well raised by Mr. Street, the Republican national committeeman. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. LOGAN. Let me ask the Senator this further. If some one who was not eligible as a Democrat under that primary could raise the question, would not a Democratic candidate, after an election, have a right to say that a Republican candidate who obtained his nomination in a Republican primary had illegally obtained his nomination because illegal votes were cast in the Republican primary?

Mr. BLACK. There are probably some voters down in Chilton County, Ala., who might like to raise that question.

Mr. LOGAN. If that be true, would not that leave Mr. Heflin, who was entirely on the outside after that resolution was passed, without any authority to raise any question about the primary, as long as there was a legal primary?

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question. Of course, if it is admitted that it is a legal primary to start with, everything else followed in accordance with the views expressed by the Senator. But is it the view of the Senator from Kentucky that under section 612 the committee had the power to fix the qualifications of a candidate for the Senate?

Mr. LOGAN. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. BORAH. If they failed to do what they ought to have done with reference to the voter, it is the Senator's contention that that would not affect the legality of the candidacy of the candidate?

Mr. LOGAN. That is exactly my contention. The Senator has correctly stated it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. Before passing to the effect, and before leaving the proposition that this was a lawful resolution, I would like to ask the Senator again whether he made this statement; and if so, whether his present argument does not satisfy any reasonable person that he had changed his mind?

Mr. BLACK. I do not care to go into the question with the Senator, of whether or not I have changed my mind. The Senator can place that in the RECORD. The Supreme Court of Alabama is the supreme court of my State.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the Senator permit me to ask the question——

Mr. BLACK. I will not permit the Senator to read my statement at this time. He will have plenty of time.

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not propose to do that.

Mr. BLACK. It has no effect upon the argument that I am making. It is wholly disconnected with it. I have stated my view, and it is in the RECORD, and I do not care to be diverted from the discussion which I am making by something which the Senator wants to put in which is wholly beside the issue.

Mr. HASTINGS. I should like to ask, if the Senator will permit to read one line of it——

Mr. BLACK. I do not yield to the Senator any further. The Senator can talk when I have finished, he and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], to their hearts' content. Evidently, that must be nearly all the Senator from Indiana has read, because he stated yesterday on this floor that the report of the Senator from Delaware showed rottenness and corruption in every precinct in Alabama, and the Senator from Delaware would not back it up when I challenged him to do so on the floor.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. Before the Senator leaves the phase of the question he was discussing when the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Idaho addressed certain questions to him, I desire to understand the view of the Senator—and I think his view and mine are in perfect accord. Let us assume that in 1928 there were 300,000 Democrats in Alabama, 200,000 of whom voted the Democratic ticket and 100,000 of whom did not. The effect of the resolution adopted by the committee in 1930 would be to prohibit anyone going on the ticket until he made an affidavit that he supported the nominees of the party in 1928, and if the interpretation of the statute argued by counsel for the contestant is correct, it automatically permitted the 200,000 Democrats who supported the ticket in 1928 to vote in the primary of 1930. It likewise automatically excluded the 100,000 voters who failed to vote the ticket in 1928. But the committee's action merely resulted in permitting the 100,000 voters to participate in the primary. That was the only effect of it. It did not affect the validity of the primary or the qualifications fixed for the candidate but merely resulted in letting persons vote who, under a strict interpretation of the law urged by counsel for contestant, would net have been entitled to vote.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator's contention is that permitting them to vote would not render the primary illegal?

Mr. BRATTON. That is correct. They could be excluded as any other illegal ballot is excluded. That is my view of it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. It seems to me pretty well settled by the law and by the construction of the law placed upon it by the different parties that, so far as the candidate was concerned, the committee had control of his qualifications.

Mr. BRATTON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BORAH. The contention is that the qualifications fixed for the candidate must necessarily be the qualifications of the voter.

Mr. BRATTON. Of the voter.

Mr. BORAH. But if the resolution failed to make the qualification of the candidate the same as that of the voter, or vice versa, the contention of the Senator from New Mexico is that that did not render the primary illegal?

Mr. BRATTON. That is my contention.

Mr. BORAH. And the candidate was still regularly on the ticket?

Mr. BRATTON. And the primary was legal.

Mr. BORAH. And the primary was legal?

Mr. BRATTON. That is my view, and if the committee made a mistake of law which resulted in enlarging the right of suffrage instead of restricting it, it resulted in permitting persons to vote who under a correct interpretation of the law were not entitled to vote.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, even though a man voted for Mr. Hoover in 1928, under this resolution he could have voted in this primary?

Mr. BRATTON. Yes. Under the hypothetical case I stated a while ago 100,000 persons would have been permitted to vote in the primary of 1930 who were not entitled to vote if the construction of the statute contended for by counsel for the contestant is correct.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, advancing to the next step, it is well to call attention to the fact that whatever was the result of the primary, whatever was its effect, after the action had been taken the contestant in this case organized an independent party. That party was organized in Alabama, and he and two State senators were nominated by it, as well as various county candidates.

There was no effort made to prevent placing Senator Bankhead's name upon the ticket in November, because the record shows that the contestant at that time concluded to take his case to the supreme court of the people of Alabama. The courts were open. Every court in Alabama that had jurisdiction was open to consider the case to prevent placing the name of Senator Bankhead upon the ballot. But it was concluded that the case should be taken to the people of Alabama. Senator Bankhead's name was placed upon the ticket without the slightest objection. There was no suit at law started in any court in that State, there was not a murmur heard in any court, but all over the State there reverberated eloquent appeals, not that the courts should declare the primary illegal, but that the people themselves should repudiate the action of the Democratic committee.

Mr. President, it would seem a strange thing, in a country where the people are supposed to rule for it to be held that it is not necessary to go into the courts and exhaust one's legal remedies, but that he can take his chances with the voters, placing a State to the tremendous expense of a statewide election and thereafter overturn the express will of the people as declared in this form of government under which we live.

It is no strange and novel doctrine that the people themselves shall control. It is the doctrine of democracy. It is the uniform law of every State in this American Union that if a man gets his name on a ballot, even though it may have gone to the ballot in an illegal method, and no effort is made to restrain it, and there is a proper legal remedy, that the voice of the people shall prevail.

That is not at all different from the ruling of this body in the two cases from Illinois and Pennsylvania. There is a distinction which is clear to everyone familiar with those cases. The Senate is the judge of the qualifications of its own Members. The adherents of the contestant have examined the State of Alabama from end to end and from center to circumference; they have summoned witnesses; threats have been made, but there has not come into this record any evidence of the unlawful expenditure of money. It is not shown that 25 men or women in Alabama were even offered money for supporting county tickets in 67 counties in that State.

We are presented here with the strange and anomalous situation of a candidate taking his battle to the people and losing before the people and then coming before the Senate of the United States and presenting the claim that after the people have ruled adversely to him he will then go back and retroactively attack a primary which was not attacked when the opportunity was there to mandamus to prevent the name of Senator Bankhead going on the ticket. There is no question but what mandamus was the proper remedy. That was held in the case of Lett against Dennis, and is backed by numerous authorities in every State in this Union.

Mr. President, it is interesting to know that the Senator from Delaware has heretofore taken the position in cases of this kind that the State should be permitted to select its own Senators. I desire to read from a part of a speech made by the Senator from Delaware on December 19, 1929. He said:

> But let us pass from this for the moment to a question that is still more dangerous, and that is whether a State shall be permitted to make its own choice of its representation in the Senate or whether it shall be compelled to adopt the ideas and the standards fixed by the Senate itself. I think every man and woman must admit that this ought to be the right of every State in the Union. I believe that everyone believes that the framers of the Constitution of the United States so intended.
> One has but to take a glance at the personnel of the Senate, the ideas they represent, and the States from which they come, to realize the necessity of this rule. As an illustration, it would be inconceivable that the people of the State of Pennsylvania would ever elect to the United States Senate a man holding the ideas and preaching the doctrines that are held and preached by the senior Senator from Nebraska. It would, on the other hand, be equally inconceivable to believe that the people of Nebraska would send to the United States Senate a man holding the ideas and preaching the doctrines of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania.
> In the Newberry case Mr. Justice McReynolds, in holding the statute [primary elections] void,. stated: "We can not conclude that authority to control party primaries or conventions for designating candidates was bestowed on Congress by the grant of power to regulate the manner of holding elections. The fair intendment of the words does not extend so far. The framers of the Constitution did not ascribe to them any such meaning, nor is this control necessary in order to effectuate the power expressly granted. On the other hand, its exercise would interfere with purely domestic affairs of the State and infringe upon liberties reserved to the people.
> It will be observed from this statement of the court's opinion that the Congress in enacting such a law had exceeded its authority and therefore left the matter of nominations in the hands of the State.
> Are the States of this Union—

Said the Senator from Delaware—that is, he said it before these horrible irregularities of writing with a pencil instead of a pen projected themselves before his vision—

> Are the States of this Union to be put in the position of submitting a questionnaire to the Senate of the United States before it goes to the trouble and expense of electing one of its citizens as a representative in that body?
> The average schoolboy would say that when a man presents himself to the Senate with proper credentials, he takes the oath of office regardless of what may have been said about the irregularities of the election, and that having taken the oath of office it takes a two-thirds vote of the Senate to expel him.
> In exercising this power [as judge of the election] it becomes the duty of the House of Representatives and of the Senate to act solely in a judicial capacity, separate and distinct from their capacity as legislators. There is no legal appeal.

Mr. President, we have reached the point with reference to the primary. I should like for those who are interested to read in the brief some cases from almost every State in the Union holding the same thing, that if there is a legal remedy to prevent the placing of a name illegally upon the ballot, it must be taken advantage of before the matter is submitted as an issue to the votes of the people. The courts take the position that if one does not let it be decided in that way, then he is depriving the people of the right of franchise. There was one case which originally held to the contrary, but that State abandoned the theory. That was the State of Montana. I have a list here of the States which have so held, as follows: Massachusetts, Missouri, Nebraska, Idaho, Texas, Kansas, Ohio, Montana, Indiana, Michigan, Colorado, Mississippi, Kentucky, South Dakota, Rhode Island, Wisconsin, and even in far-off Honolulu—Ruling Case Law, and Corpus Juris. The rule is universal and it is natural that it should be. Let us picture the situation.

Here is a situation where a man determines or desires to run for a certain office. He sees where another man has been, as he conceives it, illegally placed upon the ticket. Perhaps he conceives that being placed upon the ticket in that way it will give himself an advantage. He knows that the court is open to him, that he can go into court and file a proceeding to enjoin the placing of this name upon the ballot. But instead of doing that he says, "I will take the case to the people and I will carry my message to the people all over my State. Then, after the State has been put to the expense of an election, if the voters decide against me I will go back behind their action and attack the manner in which the name was put upon the ticket."

Strange, indeed, is the committee report which can reach the conclusion that under circumstances like those, when there is nothing to reflect upon the man whose name was placed upon the ticket, that the committee must disregard the views of the people and overrule their wishes merely because of the fact the candidate was willing to submit it to them and take his chances.

Mr. President, let us advance now to the question upon which the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] evidently bases his objection. He does not base it upon the primary. He has declined to state on the floor of the Senate that he does base it upon the primary. He bases it upon "shocking violations of law." Let us for a few moments see what are those "shocking violations of law" which have so disturbed the sensibilities of the Senator from Delaware.

In the first place he makes the statement that there were 15.2 per cent of the votes cast in the primary that were illegal. I desire to present to the Senate very briefly the basis for that statement made by the Senator from Delaware that there were 15.2 per cent of the votes illegal. He bases it on this theory: In Alabama a list of qualified voters is made up by the probate judges. That list is published every two years. It is made up in May. The list of the voters on the poll list is furnished to the election managers and clerks at the polls. Frequently there will be a variation in transcribing the thousands of names. A voter's name may be on the poll list as "J. E. Jones." He may be known as "John Jones." They place his name on the poll list as "John Jones." It may be that it is the voter's wife and that her name appears upon the poll list as "Mary Jones." She may be known as "Mrs. J. E. Jones." They write her name as "Mrs. J. E. Jones." The Senator from Delaware and his supervisors have taken out every name where it does not correspond in that way, and they class such names as illegal voters. We have here in the record the lists of the voters from two counties classified by the Senator from Delaware as illegal. I have in my hand a report made by the probate judge of Colbert County. He shows that out of 44 names which have been classed as illegal by the Senator from Delaware, all but three are qualified voters in that county, and he did not take the time to go out and hunt up the particular three.

Let us go to a very striking illustration from Macon County. I desire particularly to invite the attention of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to this illustration. It might be interesting to him. The supervisors appointed by the committee have given us a list of the voters classed as illegal voters in Macon County in the general election in November, 1930. I hope the Senator from Indiana will listen to this illustration. The probate judge has supplied the list. I want to disclose the ridiculousness of the statement of the Senator from Delaware that there were 15.2 per cent of the voters illegal.

Here is a qualified list of Macon County, Ala., which is in the files of the committee. We find in that poll list, for instance, the name of R. R. Moton. He is the head of the Tuskegee Institute. He is well known. He is evidently called "Dr." R. R. Moton in Tuskeegee, and so when he voted the election clerk placed his name on the list as

"Dr." R. R. Moton. Here he is on the list and his name can be found here on the list, but the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] has listed R. R. Moton as one of the illegal voters in Alabama merely because his name was written as "Dr." R. R. Moton instead of being written merely as "R. R. Moton."

That is a sample of the 15.2 per cent of illegal votes which the Senator from Delaware has flaunted all over the Nation. The only difference between the name as it appeared on the poll list and on the list of qualified electors is the difference between R. R. Moton and Dr. R. R. Moton.

The record shows that he voted the Democratic ticket in the general election. We find these lists in the files of the committee and I have them here for anyone who desires to see them.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BLACK. Certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Did I understand the Senator to state that the voter just named voted in the general election?

Mr. BLACK. Here is his name on the poll list. Yes; he voted.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Did I understand the Senator to say that he voted the Democratic ticket?

Mr. BLACK. The Senator should so understand, according to the record.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But he was not permitted to participate in the Democratic primary?

Mr. BLACK. Is the Senator objecting to that?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am merely asking if that be not so.

Mr. BLACK. I am asking if the Senator objects to it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do, if the Senator insists on knowing my position.

Mr. BLACK. Does not the Senator think the Democrats of Alabama ought to have the right to determine who shall vote in the Democratic primary?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Yes; but it ought to be understood that the Democrats of Alabama, represented by their committee, would not permit a colored man or woman, though native born, taxpayer, law-abiding, to participate in the Democratic primary, but when it comes to the election they invite and perhaps receive some of their votes. I merely wanted to have it clearly understood in respect to the primary and the general election.

Mr. BLACK. Here is the qualified poll list and here is the report made of these "startling and shocking" illegal voters who have been classed as illegal voters because, perchance, their initials do not conform to the initials on the list or because, perchance, they are put down on the list, as in the case to which I have just invited attention, where the name is written as "Dr. R. R. Moton" instead of "R. R. Moton."

It is interesting at this point to note that although the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] took the position yesterday afternoon that he was basing his charge of illegality largely upon these voters, that he did not attach any particular significance to it some time ago when Senator Bankhead asked if he wanted the evidence procured in Alabama to show that they were not illegal, because it will be found in the majority report on page 11 that the Senator from Delaware made this statement about the so-called illegal votes:

> Of course, speaking to the members of the committee, you can readily understand that if Judge Evans's view is adopted [that those temporarily rejected ballots should be counted unless shown to be illegal] by the committee, then in these 10 counties alone it means an investigation of 5,996 votes by outside evidence. Now, as I have observed the count, there has not been a particle of favoritism toward one side or the other with respect to that.

That is the list of voters whom the Senator from Delaware yesterday classified as being illegal.

> That is, one side has lost just about as much as the other has lost, and it occurs to me that there are very much more important things here to be determined than that. That alone will cost both sides a lot of money, and the proposition has been put up to me whether or not that is not a committee expenditure for them to get up that data. As a practical proposition—> it does not strike me that either side is hurt if they abandon it entirely.

Says Senator HASTINGS—

So much for the so-called illegal voters.

Mr. President, let us go a step farther. There were three classes of votes upon which the Senator from Delaware has depended to invalidate this election. He does not claim that there was any fraud in casting those votes; he does not assert that there is a particle of proof of fraud as to those votes; but he is startled and shocked by the irregularities with reference to three things. First, he says the ballots were not properly numbered, and he quotes at length to show that they were not properly numbered. His theory that they were not properly numbered is based upon two propositions: First, that the numbers were written with a pencil instead of a pen, and, secondly, that they were not numbered at all. The ballots which he complains were numbered with a pencil instead of a pen, I think, aggregate 125,000. The others were not numbered at all, and for that reason the Senator from Delaware says that it is shocking and disturbing and nothing can be ascertained about the result.

However, Mr. President, they have had all this time to find out whether or not there was anything wrong with those votes; and they have not presented any evidence that there were any erasures of those pencil marks. No such evidence is cited in the minority views presented by the Senator from Delaware. He is simply found complaining that 125,000 votes had been marked with a pencil. He further says this:

> It further appears that out of a total of 2,043 boxes the ballots in only 125 of them were properly numbered. This leaves 1,918 boxes where the ballots were not properly numbered.
> There are three inspectors at each polling place. That means that only 375 inspectors in the Alabama election of 1930 complied with the law with respect to the numbering of the ballots. It also appears that 5,754 election inspectors in that election violated this law and subjected themselves to a punishment of a fine of $500 or 6 months in prison.

In those cases where 128,856 ballots were written with a pencil and 58,000 were not numbered at all, for the crime thus committed the Senator from Delaware is going to send all the election officers to the penitentiary, including the election officers of the contestant in this case.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, is there any dispute about the statement there made being true?

Mr. BLACK. There is a great dispute as to whether or not it is a criminal offense for a man to write down a ballot with a pencil instead of a pen, as the Senator has set forth. The law provides a penalty not where a man does something that is improper but where he willfully does it. Does the Senator think because men are not experts as clerks and are not trained in the law and have not previously served in an election that it would be proper to subject them to fines of millions of dollars merely because they wrote with a pencil instead of a pen?

Mr. HASTINGS. I have expressed no such opinion.

Mr. BLACK. But the Senator has stated here that they subjected themselves because of improper numbering to a $500 fine of 6 months in jail.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is not that true?

Mr. BLACK. It is not.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the Senator point out why it is not true?

Mr. BLACK. It is not true because I do not construe the statute which the Senator has read as making it a criminal offense for a clerk at an election to use a pencil instead of a pen, unless he does it for fraudulent purposes; and the Senator from Delaware does not charge fraud in his minority views.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have merely stated the facts. I say when the law provides that a ballot shall be numbered in ink and it is numbered in pencil, that that is not complying with the law, and that the man who does it has subjected himself to the punishment provided under the laws of the State of Alabama.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator has mentioned 128,000 cases in which 10,000 election officers have subjected themselves to a fine of $500 for 6 months in jail for writing with a pencil instead of a pen; and he lists that as one of the shocking things that have disturbed him about Alabama. The Senator knows that that provision of the law is directory and not mandatory. It has been so held by the courts; it is so expressly set out in the law itself.

Now let us see. The next crime to which the Senator refers is that the election officers folded up the ballots and did not roll them. He divides the crime in this instance into two particular classes. One of them is that they took the ballots and folded them like this [indicating], and he gives the number, mounting up into the thousands, which instead of being rolled, I presume like this [indicating], were folded, and he again calls attention in his report that in each instance where the election officers dared to fold the ballots they subjected themselves to a prison sentence in Alabama and to a fine.

The next thing he says is——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The ballots are supposed to be rolled up and sealed, are they not, so that there can be no duplications?

Mr. BLACK. I have just started to explain there were two classes of alleged crimes. The first class was that the ballots were not rolled, but were folded.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If they are folded it is of course comparatively easy to duplicate the original ballots with dummies that are put in afterwards, or with those that have been prepared in favor of another candidate.

Regarding marking in pencil and in ink, it is so much easier, is it not, to duplicate ballots when the numbers are entered by pencil than with a pen and ink? Is not the whole purpose of the law to prevent any fraud in an election along that line?

Mr. BLACK. Does the Senator know how they are numbered in Indiana?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. As I remember, they are numbered in ink.

Mr. BLACK. Does the Senator know that?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is my recollection, but I may be wrong.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator never heard of anybody in Indiana using a pencil?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Without consulting the Indiana statute I can not make a positive statement on this point.

Mr. BLACK. I suggest that the Senator look up the law of his State and see which way it provides. I might also suggest that I was given this morning a statement that in the State of Delaware pencils are used instead of pens. That statement was made and is here on my desk in a hearing held by a Senate committee.

Mr. President, as I started to say, the Senator from Delaware divides this class of crime into two groups, one of which is that the ballots were folded instead of being rolled. It may be that in Indiana the election officers are so expert in performances of that kind that such a circumstance would be very suspicious, but I would say that even in Indiana, in so far as I am concerned, until some evidence was adduced that the act was fraudulent I would be willing to give the benefit of the doubt to the people of the State of Indiana, despite their political history.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. May I inquire whether the Senator from Alabama does not believe that the provision of the law of Alabama which requires that the ballots shall be rolled and sealed and placed in the boxes immediately after they are counted is not an important one that ought to be recognized and complied with?

Mr. BLACK. It is one of the numerous provisions of the law, and I think, so long as we have nonexperts administering the law, that we will find that some of them will roll ballots and some of them will fold them; some of them will seal the ballots and some of them will not seal them; some of them will write with a pencil and some of them will write with a pen.

I think it is petty and trivial to number up into the thousands and hundreds of thousands such insignificant details in order to mislead the people of the United States into believing that by their mere cumulative effect there is fraud in an election. One might as well go to Delaware and find out how many people are jaywalkers across the streets of the cities of that State, count them up into the thousands, and say, because they are jaywalkers and because they dare to cross streets in places otherwise than those provided by law, that the people of Delaware are a lawless, corrupt, and crooked people. I deny that any such inference could be justly drawn.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that it is not the Delaware law we are discussing but it is the Alabama law, passed by the Alabama Legislature, and this very provision was placed in the law for the protection of the people of Alabama, as I assume, and I assume that it is an important provision. I have asked that particular question, but I think the Senator has not answered it.

Mr. BLACK. I think I have answered it very satisfactorily. I believe it is so important that the code itself has provided that, in the absence of fraud, it amounts to nothing; that, in the absence of fraud, it is simply directory. The effort to convince the people of this Nation that there is fraud in an election merely because 128,000 ballots are written with a pencil, when every ballot is brought here under the eagle eye of the Senator's careful scrutiny and he can not present to the Senate a single, solitary, lonesome insteance in which there was fraud, is an outrageous affront to the people of this Nation. There is no evidence in this record that any ballots that were rolled and sealed were broken. The Senator has not reported to the Senate any one single instance where such is the case. I have examined the record and the report. No such contention is made in the report. Where the ballots were rolled and sealed, according to the report, negatively at least, they were all sealed. There is no evidence that they were broken.

There is evidence that the ballot boxes were open, but the Senator himself in his own statement before the committee has stated that he attaches no significance to that and yet, again on the floor of the Senate he repeats the statement as to how many ballot boxes were open. I submit that he does not know how many ballot boxes were open.

I have four different statements from his own report and the reports of his supervisors as to how many ballot boxes were open before they came here. I have, for instance, before me the report taken from the ledger of his committee, which shows that there were 738 sealed and 1,087 unsealed. No statement is made as to the other few hundred, whether they were sealed or not. I find also in the Senator's report, on page 7, the statement that there were 1,618 unsealed and 425 sealed. In the ledger report it is reported there were 1,087 unsealed and 738 sealed. The agents, however, collecting the boxes and who brought them here show that there were 902 sealed when they obtained them. Yet the Senator has listed as one of his striking exhibits the fact, as he says in his report, that only 425 boxes were sealed, when, according to his own ledger report, which we obtained from the sheets, 902 were sealed according to the agents' report.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think the Senator ought to be fair enough to state that in that report I explained the large discrepancy between the two by stating, when my attention was called to it, that one of the cases was when the boxes were examined here, and the seals appeared to be broken; and the explanation was that it must have been done during transit, because the original report showed a less number. I called the attention of the committee to that fact in the report.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, on page 10 of the report of the Senator we find the statement which I am about to read. The Senate heard the discussion yesterday about the boxes being opened and the seals being broken, and that is given as one of the startling and shocking evidences of disregard of law and of fraud. Let us see what the Senator said about it some months ago:

> If this was the practice in the elections of Alabama, and that is admitted, then the finding of the seals broken has no particular significance.

In other words, Mr. President, it was the practice to put the certificates in the box; and the law required that they should be opened, and the supreme court has so held, and they were opened, in those instances where the certificates were put in the box; and yet that is listed as one of the startling and shocking evidences of fraud, or the opportunity for fraud. I will say that it seems that to some people the opportunity for fraud is far more corrupt than the actual fraud itself, judging from the votes which have heretofore been cast.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama farther yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I will ask the Senator whether he thinks the provision of the law requiring that these ballots be placed in the box, and the box sealed and kept by the sheriff for a period of six months after the election, is an important provision that ought to be observed or not?

Mr. BLACK. That they should be sealed and kept? Why, certainly. In the case of the primary, it provides 30 days. The other law provides six months; and they were kept.

The Senator has called attention to the fact that in three counties the ballots were destroyed. They were destroyed after the 30 days had expired; and, in addition to that, the votes in those boxes, according to the returns, show within 1 per cent of the same percentages that are shown in every other county in the State.

The decision of the supreme court justifies the opening of the boxes. The Senator is familiar with that. He heard it read before the committee. There is no question about the right to open the boxes in order to take out the certificates.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think the Senator ought to explain what the situation is in that respect.

Mr. BLACK. I shall be glad to explain it.

Mr. HASTINGS. It is clearly shown in the report just what that situation is.

Mr. BLACK. It is held that where the certificate or the return is put in the box, so that the canvassing board do not have the certificate outside of the box, they can open the box. That is correct.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is not a fair statement of the facts.

Mr. BLACK. I shall be glad to have the Senator amend it.

Mr. HASTINGS. The law distinctly provides for two boxes. The Senator knows that, does he not? One is a returning box and the other is the box in which the votes shall be placed after they are counted. The law distinctly provides that the votes, after they are counted, shall be rolled and sealed and placed in that box, and that box shall be sealed, and placed in the hands of the sheriff, and kept for six months, and then destroyed without breaking the seal on the box.

The other box that is required is the returning box; and it is the returning box that the court says shall be permitted to be opened in order to ascertain what the result is. The reason why I stated that it becomes unimportant is Senator Bankhead's statement that they have not followed that practice in Alabama for 25 years. They have used one box for all purposes.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct. They have not been using two boxes. The people of Alabama have seen fit to use one box. It is a custom which has been in force all these years.

Mr. HASTINGS. But it is not the law.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator has become a great stickler for law. He thinks everything that is written on the books with reference to the details assumes great magnitude, even though there is no fraud connected with it.

Mr. HASTINGS. There must have been some purpose in enacting the law.

Mr. BLACK. The mere fact that a pencil has been used instead of a pen, time and time again, shocks the tender sensibilities of the Senator from Delaware. I suggest that before the Senator goes all the way to Alabama to condemn the voters of that State for using a pencil instead of a pen, his services might be useful at home.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to read from the Mayfield case with reference to irregularities.

> The ballots were gathered in the State of Texas through the office of the Sergeant at Arms and were transmitted in sealed pouches by the Post Office Department under lock and key, with every safeguard against possible tampering.
>
> * * * * * * *
> There were many irregularities and discrepancies and clear violations of law in connection with the casting of the ballots.

The Senator knows, and everybody else knows, that there always will be irregularities or discrepancies, unless you are going to hire people with the meticulous gaze of the Senator from Delaware—

> As, for example, the laws of Texas provide that the ballots shall be signed by the judge of election.
>
> Thirty thousand two hundred and nine Mayfield ballots were not thus signed.
>
> Fourteen thousand six hundred and nine Peddy ballots were not thus signed.
> The law provides that the ballots shall be numbered.
>
> One thousand seven hundred and twenty-three Mayfield ballots were not numbered.
> One thousand and twenty-one Peddy ballots were not numbered.
> The law provides that the ballots that are cast shall be stamped "voted."
> One hundred eighty-seven thousand three hundred and eighty-seven Mayfield ballots were not thus marked.
> Ninety-two thousand one hundred and ninety-two Peddy ballots were not thus marked.

In other words, out of 221,000 votes cast for Mayfield, 187,387 were not marked, in violation of the law of the State of Texas; and I presume it would be fit and proper at this time to go back down to Texas and imprison the people who failed to mark and number 187,000 votes in the State of Texas. Ninety-two thousand Peddy ballots were not marked out of 117,000. In other words, when we find irregularities in that case, examined by the full committee, reported on to this body and voted on unanimously, they did not reach the stupendous proportions that have been asserted here in so far as effect is concerned, because the Senator from Delaware, fortunately for the State of Texas, evidently was not the chairman of the committee.

> These are illustrations of the irregularities, discrepancies, and violations of law, but no one of them, nor all of them together, in the judgment of your committee, either did or ought to change the result.

That was the law then. It was accepted as the law on both sides of this Chamber by unanimous vote. Why should it be departed from to-day?

Mr. President, the statement has been made that poll taxes were paid in violation of law. The law of Alabama provides, not exactly as stated by the Senator, but that where the poll tax of one person is paid by another for the purpose of influencing his vote it is illegal.

In two counties of the State the evidence showed that it had been customary for the parties to pay poll taxes—De Kalb County and Franklin County. Both of them are closely contested counties. De Kalb County at the present time is under Republican administration. Franklin County is under Democratic administration. The evidence showed that in both those counties from time to time the parties themselves—at the beginning of the year and before the date expired for the payment of poll taxes—would take up a party collection and pay the poll tax for members of their party. That does not necessarily mean that they had violated the law with reference to influencing votes. The law was intended to prevent an individual from paying the poll tax of another in order to control his vote.

As a matter of fact, the right of suffrage is one which is sacred in this country. Not in all of the States do they have a poll tax at all; but in Alabama it is necessary to pay your poll tax in order to vote.

The Senator wants to condemn the group paying the poll tax by voluntary contributions, long before the election occurs, simply because they happen to assist in paying the poll tax of some who might otherwise be deprived of the right of casting their votes at the ballot box.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama farther yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to read into the RECORD, just at this point, the section that has been referred to.

Mr. BLACK. I shall be glad to have it read.

Mr. HASTINGS (reading):

SEC. 3464. Poll tax paid by another; penalty: Any person who shall pay the poll tax of another, or advance him money for that purpose in order to influence his vote, shall be guilty of bribery, and, upon conviction, shall be imprisoned in the penitentiary for not less than one nor more than five years.

Mr. BLACK. That is exactly what I said the law was—in order to influence his vote.

Mr. HASTINGS. Just a minute. Does the Senator say that it must be for the purpose of influencing his vote?

Mr. BLACK. Unquestionably it must be to influence his vote.

Mr. HASTINGS (reading):

Any person who shall pay the poll tax of another—

Followed by a comma; that is one thing—or advance him money for that purpose in order to influence his vote—

That is an entirely different matter.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator may think that the court would so hold; but, somehow, I do not believe that in a question where the right of suffrage is involved the court is going to strain at a gnat and swallow a camel in order to send somebody to the penitentiary.

Mr. HASTINGS. May I make this inquiry: Can it be said that a political party pays the poll tax of a person except for the purpose of influencing his vote?

Mr. BLACK. I do not know. They might think they would get his vote; but I imagine they would not always get it. Of course, the practice was most common up in De Kalb County, where the probate judge is a Republican.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRATTON. Does the Senator from Delaware think that if a husband paid the poll tax for his wife he would be subject to prosecution under that statute?

Mr. HASTINGS. I should not think he would be. He might be technically guilty, but I do not suppose he would be prosecuted.

Mr. BRATTON. Let me put it in this way: Does the Senator think that under that statute a husband would be guilty if he paid his wife's poll tax?

Mr. HASTINGS. I say I think under this statute he would be technically guilty, but I do not think anybody would prosecute him.

Mr. BRATTON. Why not?

Mr. HASTINGS. Because of the particular circumstances.

Mr. BRATTON. If we eliminate the element of intent, and the naked payment of a poll tax constitutes an offense, then, of course, a husband would violate the law if he paid his wife's poll tax.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is correct.

Mr. BRATTON. Is that the Senator's view of the law of Alabama?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; absolutely.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, that is in line with the view which would send a man to jail for writing with a pencil instead of a pen, or for folding a ballot instead of rolling it.

Now, let us get down to the facts in this case which show beyond the shadow of a doubt, even though the burden is not on the contestee, that there was no fraud which affected his election.

In the first place, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that it was announced in Alabama that there would be watchers of the independent ticket all over the State. It was also announced that these watchers would send in their reports to the county managers, and they in turn would send them to the independent headquarters. Senator Bankhead requested that the committee write to each one of the independent managers and ask if there had been any fraud reported in his county. That request did not come from Senator Heflin, it came from Senator Bankhead, with the request—and the request was made by the committee—that they report to the committee frauds committed in their counties, if there were any frauds, and whether or not the official vote was correct. That letter went to all of them, as I understand it. The list was furnished by the attorney for Senator Heflin. The letter went from the supervisor, Mr. Smith, asking that the managers report any frauds which came to their attention from their watchers. It was also requested that they send in their watchers' certificates to Washington, in order that we might find out whether immediately after the election Heflin and Locke watchers claimed there had been any fraud. The watchers were supposed to certify how many votes were cast.

Senators will find in the minority report in this case, as I recall it on pages 48 to 75, the reports of those watchers, and, strange to say, although the Senator from Delaware said there was ample opportunity for fraud all over Alabama, not a single watcher in a single report from a supporter of the Heflin-Locke ticket has communicated to this body that there was fraud in the election.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Are these watchers to whom the Senator is referring election officials; that is, are they recognized under the laws of Alabama?

Mr. BLACK. They are recognized under the laws of Alabama.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Are they required to make reports to any authority?

Mr. BLACK. They are not required to make reports. They were instructed by Senator Heflin's party to make reports to their headquarters.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Privileges and Elections Committee of the Senate, at the instance of Senator Bankhead, called upon them to state whether they had reported any instance of fraud?

Mr. BLACK. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And there was no instance of fraud reported by them?

Mr. BLACK. We have here the reports from those watchers, in which they send the reports received from their watchers, and they correspond to the official count. Senators will find instance after instance where they have made reports, as appears from pages 48 to 75, where their reports correspond with the official count; they will find others where they said they did not keep their watchers' reports because of the fact that they corresponded with the official count, the official count was correct, and they threw the reports into the waste-paper basket. Senators will find others who say that they did not keep the reports, that the managers took the reports over the phone, and finding that they corresponded with the official count, they made no notation of them. They will find others who say that they made a report to Judge Wilkinson, the attorney for the contestant. They will find that in the county of Barbour.

In other words, although ample opportunity had been given to the very people who were placed at the polls for the purpose of reporting frauds for the benefit of the independent ticket, although the request went to them all over Alabama, not a single one has supplied a scintilla of evidence on which it can be proven that there were 5 votes improperly counted in Alabama. Yet in the face of that, in the face of reports made, the failure to make reports, the Senator from Delaware wants to set aside the entire election and unseat a United States Senator because in 128,000 instances the election managers and watchers used a pencil instead of a pen and folded ballots instead of rolling them.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is not a true statement.

Mr. BLACK. I think it is.

Mr. HASTINGS. There is no such thing in the report as that. The Senator has just stated that, as far as I was concerned, I wanted the election declared null and void because of the marking of the ballots with a pencil instead of in ink and for failure to roll the ballots.

Mr. BLACK. I can read from the Senator's summary——

Mr. HASTINGS. That is not a fair statement of the report.

Mr. BLACK. I can read from the Senator's summary, in which the Senator gave that as one of the things that made the election bad.

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; but that is not what the Senator has just said. If he had said that that was one of the reasons, he might have been correct; but that is not what he said.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator himself stated in the record that he attached no importance to opening the boxes, and that he attached no importance to the illegal votes, and it leaves nothing in the world upon which to base his report except the ballots as they were numbered, and as they were rolled or folded. There are only four different elements the Senator has submitted to the Senate, one the numbering of the ballots, which includes the pencil and pen matter; one the folding instead of rolling; one opening up of the ballot boxes; and the Senator himself has said he attached no significance to that, and the Senator has said he attached no significance to the illegal votes. That leaves as the sole base upon which he places his case the numbering of the ballots and folding instead of rolling.

What is the numbering of the ballots? He divides it into two parts, one where they wrote with a pencil, one where they did not number at all.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. In part 3 of the record, at page 395, and running over to page 398, there are 52 separate and distinct items in the brief filed by the contestant. In those the Senator will be able to find the charges made in this case.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I am delighted that the Senator made that statement. I am glad he made that statement. It shows just exactly what I have been pointing out to the Senate—that the Senator is not basing his charges on what he found, but he is basing his charges upon the suspicions of the lawyer for the contestant.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that after that was filed there was no answer at all made by the counsel for Mr. Bankhead.

Mr. BLACK. When was it filed?

Mr. HASTINGS. Does not the Senator know?

Mr. BLACK. The day the case was closed, according to my information; and now the Senator comes here and, not basing his case upon his findings, not putting his feet squarely upon the facts in the record, he takes the vague and wild suspicions of the attorney for the contestant and attempts to unseat a Senator of the United States.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. There was a hearing in which these things were set forth, and several days afterwards the committee had another hearing and expected to continue the matter so that the counsel for Senator Bankhead could reply to this argument and to these charges which have been set up, and the reply was that he did not care to make any argument.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator is correct. Even though they had been surprised at many things that had been done, and even though they had been surprised at many statements that had been published, counsel for Mr. Bankhead and Mr. Bankhead himself never imagined, even in their wildest flights of imagination, that the Senator from Delaware, instead of basing his case upon the facts adduced in the record, instead of basing his case upon the facts which he found, instead of basing his case upon his own conclusions, would stand here and say, "I fall back now on a brief filed by the attorney for the contestant." But that is the situation. I doubt whether there is a parallel to that in all the history of contests in the Senate or in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. President, what do we find now? The Senator from Delaware, driven from his own report by the irresistible facts in this case, as his feet are insecurely placed upon the shifting sands of the charges that pencils were used instead of pens, and that the ballots were folded instead of rolled, we find standing on the insecure island of a brief prepared by the attorney for the contestant. No wonder, when the Senator is driven by the irresistible facts from the conclusions which he has reached, that he seeks to base an ouster of a United States Senator upon something a lawyer said in the record.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that these statements in this brief are but very little different from those contained in the report adopted by the minority members of the committee.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, if they are different at all, why does the Senator have to jump from his own report to the lawyer's report?

Mr. HASTINGS. I only called attention to that fact because there was no reply made to it, and I assumed the charges were admitted as facts.

Mr. BLACK. Oh, that is a very adroit method; but, Mr. President, the facts remain the same—that when the Senator is driven from his report, when he knows he can not stand on it, when he knows that justice will not permit him to stand on it because there are no facts there except the petty and insignificant details of writing with a pencil instead of a pen, then he has to go somewhere, and he flies straightway into the arms of the attorney for the contestant for his facts.

Why, if these were the facts on which he relied, did he not put them into his report? If they are in the evidence, why did he not place them in his report, so that they could be answered? Was it assumed that Mr. Bankhead, the Senator who has the seat, would be required on this floor to reply to the vague and imaginary charges of a man who has proven himself capable of imagining all the charges on earth? No, Mr. President; the reason why the Senator flies for help is because there is no safety on the spot where he has planted his feet.

Mr. President, let us see another matter which shows the absurdity of attempting to unseat a United States Senator because of petty, trivial, and insignificant irregularities. When this question of the tightly folded ballots came up, and it was given as a very suspicious circumstance, Senator

Bankhead went to Mr. Smith, the supervisor, and said, "Mr. Smith, give to me the most suspicious of the folded ballots you have. Select those which in your judgment are suspicious, those which have been pointed out to you as positively not carrying out the intention of the voters. Let me have them, and I will get you affidavits. We will see just what the people themselves swear."

Mr. Smith picked him out three lists, from Cherokee County, Marshall County, and Madison County, and gave them to him as the most suspicious of the folded ballots. He gave him the names on those ballots.

There is in the record an affidavit from the voters whose names appeared in that list, and each one of them swears under oath that he voted exactly according to the ballot that is in the suspicious list.

Then Mr. Bankhead asked for some more, and they did not give him any more. He wrote a letter to the Senator from Delaware and said, "Now, if there are any more suspicious foldings, let me have them. Let us have all of them, and we will get affidavits, if we have to get an affidavit from every voter in Alabama."

The law did not put that burden on Mr. Bankhead, but he assumed it, and the Senator from Delaware did not present him a single other ballot, which he said was suspicious.

And yet, Mr. President, driven now from that point because he knows he can not stand on the "folded" instead of "rolled" point, he takes the position that the thing, after all, is whether they folded them or whether they rolled them, and nobody cares for whom they voted.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BLACK. Certainly.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think the Senator is talking about something that is not included in the report, so far as I know. I think that it is not made clear in the report what the committee was driving at, or else the Senator is talking about something I do not know anything about.

Mr. BLACK. I am talking about the letter written to the Senator and the affidavits which appear in the report.

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not mean the letter, but what is the particular thing the Senator is emphasizing?

Mr. BLACK. I am emphasizing the affidavits that were secured and which appear on pages 41, 42, 43, 44, and 45, of the minority report, the affidavits of the men and women who swear that they voted exactly as their ballots appeared, as shown by what the Senator is pleased to call "suspiciously folded ballots."

Mr. HASTINGS. I have not referred anywhere so far as I know in the report to suspiciously folded ballots.

Mr. BLACK. If the Senator did not use the word "suspiciously," I accept the correction, but I assume that the Senator thought they were suspicious or he would not have listed them as one of the reasons for overturning the will of the people of Alabama.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the Senator tell me where it is listed so I may get it straight? I do not know where it is listed.

Mr. BLACK. Where what is listed?

Mr. HASTINGS. The part about folding the ballots.

Mr. BLACK. On page 6 of the Senator's report, as I recall. I will read it for the Senator. On page 9 of his report, in the second paragraph, the Senator referred to the loosely folded and tightly folded ballcts.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the Senator mean this statement?

> Out of the total of 2,043 boxes, in 1,543 of them the ballots were found folded instead of rolled and sealed, and in 576 boxes they were found loose, both of these irregularities frequently occurring in the same box.

Mr. BLACK. That is correct.

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not understand what the Senator is talking about with respect to the affidavits.

Mr. BLACK. I will explain to the Senator exactly what it is. Always up to the time of this contest it has been supposed that one of the objects of an election was to find out for whom the people voted. We did not know until this contest that the only important thing is whether the ballots were rolled or folded. So that I assume when the Senator reported that so many of them were folded instead of rolled, he naturally threw some doubt as to the person for whom those people voted.

If that is not true, then, of course, there is no reason to put it in the report at all, because the object of the election is to find out for whom the people voted. Senator Bankhead secured from Mr. Smith a list of those that Mr. Smith thought were the most suspicious and sent that list of ballots down to the three counties I have named. An affidavit was obtained from each one of the voters showing for whom he voted. The affidavits disclosed that they had voted just exactly as was shown in the list. Of course, if the only object of an election is to determine whether the ballots were properly rolled and properly marked with a pen instead of a pencil, then that would not be material, but if the object is to find out for whom they voted, it is fully explained.

Mr. HASTINGS. What is referred to in the report is the failure to roll and seal them. The important thing is that they were not sealed.

Mr. BLACK. That is far more important than it is to show for whom they voted! It seems, according to the contention of the Senator from Delaware, that it is immaterial for whom they voted. Although we sent back there and secured the affidavits of every one of them, yet now the Senator from Delaware, having stepped lightly and fantastically from his own report to the brief of counsel for contestant, comes back now to his report and says the only thing of importance is whether the ballots were folded and sealed. In other words, it is immaterial to determine for whom they voted. I always had the idea up to this time that it was far more important to find out whom the people of the State wanted for their United States Senator than it was to find out whether the clerks and election managers used a pen or pencil or a roll instead of a fold.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I can not get clear in my own mind who this man Smith was who is mentioned.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Harrison W. Smith is the supervisor appointed by the subcommittee to investigate the ballots and conduct the recount.

Mr. President, let us see what is the next proposition. A great deal of talk has been made about the absentee ballots. I want Senators to note this fact. Senator Bankhead was perfectly willing to have a test made of absentee voters in the State. A request was sent out for those who voted absentee ballots to tell how they had voted. Reports were received from 1,005 in 61 counties. There was a total of 4,566 reported. Out of that 4,566 the returns showed that there were 13 who voted for Bankhead where their ballot was marked for Heflin; that there were 14 who voted for Heflin where the ticket was marked for Bankhead. There were 2 who reported they voted for neither, but the ballots were marked for Heflin. There were 4 who reported they voted for neither and the ballots were marked for Bankhead. In other words, a total of 15 votes were changed from Heflin to Bankhead and a total of 18 from Bankhead to Heflin out of 4,566 absentee votes. Yet the charge is made in this report that the perjury committed by those who voted by absentee ballot is shocking.

What is that so-called perjury? The law of Alabama provides that a man who is away from his home at election time—on business, as I recall the law—may be allowed to vote by absentee ballot. The inference is left in the report of the Senator from Delaware that it is necessary for the man to have been continuously abiding directly at the place where he cast the absentee ballot. If that is the law, then I would not be entitled to vote in Alabama, because I have been away from there six or seven months. The chief justice of the Supreme Court of Alabama, who has been in Montgomery, Ala., for a long period of years, has retained his citizenship back in his home county. The same thing has occurred with reference to various others. People come to Washington, for instance, and secure positions here. Under the laws of our State they are permitted to vote by absentee ballot. But the charge is made here practically that every person of that kind is guilty of the crime of perjury. I deny it and I resent it. Why, Mr. President, it is not true that a man is not entitled to vote in Alabama if he leaves there for a year or two but keeps his citizenship there. That law is as old as any law of the country. Citizenship is determined largely as a matter of intent. That is what is shown by the absentee ballots.

Let us see what next shows absolutely that there was no fraud. Taking it upon the basis that there was no fraud, on the next day after the election the Associated Press report came out, as appears on pages 86 and 87 of the hearings. In the Associated Press reports Senator Bankhead's majority was given as 51,000. It would have been wholly and completely and physically impossible to have framed up 51,000 majority without there being a state-wide conspiracy. It would have been absolutely necessary and essential that the watchers for the independent ticket and the clerks and managers to have participated in it, a thing which is totally unbelievable.

The same thing happened with reference to Jefferson County. The report was made the very next day after the election by the Associated Press. The attorney for the contestant, who is a vigorous, aggressive attorney, lives in Jefferson County. It is the largest county in the State. The contestant's representatives sent to Birmingham, the center of the county, for evidence. They did not bring any witnesses to show that the Associated Press report was wrong. They did not present any witnesses to show that there was anything wrong in Jefferson County, the home of the attorney for the contestant, and yet the Associated Press report came out there the very next day after the election. It was reported there, box by box. There is in the record a list of the election managers and clerks showing those who were for one ticket and those for the other. There were aggressive watchers there in addition to the clerks and the managers who were there for the independent ticket. There were 35,000 votes cast in that county. Mr. Hampton had said something about it, and it will be found in the minority report at page 24. Let us see why that is important.

This is the way Mr. Hampton, the attorney for the contestant, stated it:

> Let us assume, as we think we shall be able to prove, that the returns posted did not represent the vote cast on that day. All ballots in the box at that moment would be right there, but the returns posted and given out did not tell the truth about them.

In other words, he charges that they were falsified all over Alabama by a general state-wide conspiracy at the very time they posted the returns on the doors.

> Senator GEORGE. Then your theory would be that the election managers just arbitrarily put up those figures and subsequently fixed the boxes so as to correspond with them?
> Mr. HAMPTON. Certainly—

That is the attorney for the contestant—

> Mr. HAMPTON. Certainly; that is the burden of our contention that the ballots in the boxes were made afterwards to fit the returns, and that this took place at some time during the weeks and months the boxes were in the hands of the Bankhead election officers, broken open in violation of the laws of Alabama.
> Of course, the Associated Press and Senator Heflin's watchers could not send any report different from that made by the official returns.

Why could not Senator Heflin send out a different report? His watchers were there. We have the record that they were there. We have their replies and statements from many of them that they were there. Why were they bound to accept the Associated Press return if the returns were false?

Mr. President, it is as conclusive as anything ever could be in a court or before a judicial body. The Associated Press reports were put up there and they were correct. It has been shown they were right at every step in the case. But now the Senator from Delaware, in order to try to unseat a United States Senator, steps nimbly away from the proposition of the legality of the primary, escapes from the proposition of sealed ballot boxes, and plants himself on the brief filed by the attorney for the contestant.

Mr. President, let us see another thing which is conclusive, if there were not another thing in the case. Many Senators will recall the statement made that all that was needed was to get the ballot boxes. It was said that if we got the ballot boxes it would be shown that there was a difference of 100,000 votes. The ballot boxes came. The ballot boxes are here. Under the law the ballot is supposed to be secret, but this law to which my friend from Delaware looks up and before which he bows with such reverence and respect when it refers to writing with a pencil instead of a pen is not now so sacred. He is perfectly willing to have the secrecy of the ballot destroyed, and so there has been published—and I have it here before me now and can give it to Senators if they want it—a tabulated report of the voters in Alabama disclosing how each voted. That was done along about the last of September. The poll list is here; I have it. It is most interesting, and it is conclusive. There was one of these for each county. It takes up the voters beat by beat.

Why was this done? It was done because the attorneys for the contestant said that if they could have the record of how the voters had actually cast their votes they would then be able to investigate and show that there were ballots that had been improperly marked. In other words, he claimed that the ballots had been changed. I read to the Senate a moment ago one of his statements. Here is the picture. He comes before the committee after they have counted the votes. Of course, at first we were told that all it was necessary to do was to count the ballots, and that would show that the election was fraudulent; but when the counting of the ballots corroborated the Associated Press, when it corroborated the official reports, the attorneys for the contestant said, "Well, the ballots have been changed; now give us the list of how the voters voted." There was placed at their disposal last September a list of the voters in Alabama marked to show the ones who had voted for Bankhead and those who had voted for Heflin. They had that list during October, November, December, January, February, March, and April—seven months. That was ample time for discoveries to be made as to whether or not ballots had been changed.

The list was in their possession, and up to this good day the evidence has failed to show even a suspicion that there were more than 5 ballots changed in all the State of Alabama. I have those ballots here. There is considerable question about them. The two that were changed were absentee votes that were taken to the probate office and put on the probate desk and left there. With reference to the other three, there is overwhelming preponderance of evidence that the ballots had not been changed.

A ballot in Cleburne County also was that of an absentee voter. But, bear this in mind: The secrecy of the ballot has been done away with. Here is the list for anyone who desires to see it [exhibiting]. The contestant had it; he had diligent and vigorous counsel. They have had in their possession, for instance, a list showing how every man and woman in Jefferson County voted. It was easy enough for the attorney to go himself or send somebody to see how a voter voted. He could have gone straight to his friends and neighbors, and if this widespread fraud which has been talked about had existed, perhaps the first or second man he saw would have said, "Yes; I was marked for Bankhead, but I voted for Heflin"; but after seven months' time they present to the Senate the puny and insignificant number of five who claimed that their votes had been changed.

The attorneys for the contestant went to Birmingham and took evidence. They had in their possession at that time a list of the voters showing for whom each one voted. It would not have been difficult at all to have gone out and said, "Come in here and state how you voted." Why did they not do that? There is only one answer. You know, Mr. President, and every other person who is within the sound of my voice knows, that if these votes had been improperly marked, the diligent supporters of the independents would have secured their names and there would have been affidavits flowing to the Senate investigating committee. They did not get them because the votes were correctly counted. That is the reason they did not get them.

I submit that it is an affront to the intelligence of the Senate to come in here and ask the Senate to set aside an election on the petty and insignificant trivialities that have been set up with reference to folding and rolling ballots and marking with a pencil under circumstances such as these.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to inquire of the Senator about the list to which he has referred. The list is made up, as I understand, from ballots taken out of the ballot boxes?

Mr. BLACK. It is.

Mr. NORRIS. Every ballot is numbered?

Mr. BLACK. It is.

Mr. NORRIS. And the voter's name has a corresponding number?

Mr. BLACK. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. So that in looking the ballots over and comparing them with poll lists one would be able to ascertain just who cast each ballot which was examined?

Mr. BLACK. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. And the entire State was covered in that way?

Mr. BLACK. The list of voters in the entire State was published with the exception of three counties, where the ballots were destroyed in 30 days, and with the exception of the ballots that were not numbered, which were about 58,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there a provision of the law of Alabama which permits that to be done? How did that come about?

Mr. BLACK. It was done because the Senate committee authorized it to be done.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. It was done on application of counsel for the parties in the case. I think Mr. Heflin's counsel asked that it be done. Then the full list was examined, the ballots compared, and the complete list of all the voters was published sometime late last summer. I would not be able to say exactly the date, but perhaps in August.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, permit me to say, for the information of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], that wherever a ballot was cast for Mr. Bankhead a slash was placed in front of the name of the voter, and if the ballot was cast for Mr. Heflin a cross was placed following the name of the voter. So that both sides knew how each ballot was marked, and knew the name of the voter who cast each ballot, thus giving them full information and enabling them to go to Alabama and say to John Jones, for instance, "Your ballot appears to be cast for Bankhead; is that correct?" And so on throughout the State.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I might amplify the matter by reading just why this was done. On page 58, part 1, of the hearings appears this colloquy between Senator HASTINGS and Mr. Hampton, attorney for Senator Heflin:

Mr. HAMPTON. Our third request is:

"That each side be furnished with the numbers (where the ballots are numbered) of ballots marked for the contestant and the contestee."

Senator HASTINGS. The purpose of that, as I understand it, is to give each side an opportunity to check up in any particular district they want to check up in, with the person who cast the ballot—to check up in any particular district they want to check up in, with the person who cast the ballot, to ascertain, for instance, whether or not he actually cast his vote for Heflin, or whether he cast his vote for Bankhead. Is that correct?

Note that—

Mr. HAMPTON. That is correct. Our view is that nothing in this contest is perhaps so important as that.

I agree with him in so far as obtaining the truth of the case is concerned there could be nothing more important——

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. Let me finish this, and I will be glad to yield to the Senator.

We have affidavits which we will later present to the committee, when you come to hear the matter, where the voters swear, take their oath that they voted for Senator Heflin—

It will be noticed he said he expected to prove it—voters whose votes are now in the boxes marked for Bankhead.

Senator WATSON. Do you mean in these 10 counties alone you are talking about?

Senator HASTINGS. Oh, no.

Senator WATSON. I just want to find that out. That involves, then, our going on and opening all the ballot boxes in all the State?

Senator HASTINGS. We are doing that, anyhow.

That is the reason the boxes were opened up.

I now yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I should like to explain to the Senator from Nebraska that the list published does not show how the voter voted so that anyone getting hold of a list outside of the parties interested themselves could ascertain the fact. It does not disclose how persons voted. I thought the Senator from Nebraska would be interested in knowing that. However, we did have a supervisor check the vote and give to the interested parties the confidential information contained, but that was not given to the public. I thought the Senator from Nebraska might be concerned about that point.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not quite understand; perhaps I did not get the explanation which the Senator from Delaware has made.

Mr. HASTINGS. In the first place, there was given the number of the voter and his name. That is all that was published and that is all that appears in print. That does not show how the individual voted.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the Senator from Alabama to say that——

Mr. BLACK. They were supplied the list; yes.

Mr. NORRIS. There was a slash before the name of one candidate and a cross before the name of the other.

Mr. BLACK. The Senator from Delaware is explaining that the information was not given out to the public, but that there was given to the contestant and the contestee the information with marks in front of the names to show how the individuals had voted.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is what I was interested in having the Senator from Nebraska understand.

Mr. BLACK. That is correct.

Mr. President, at an expense of perhaps more than $100,000 this contest has gone on up to this time. If there were anything in the world that would be conclusive as to who was elected it would be this list itself [exhibiting], with the names checked off, and with seven months to find out whether or not the voters so listed had been incorrectly counted. Of course we all know that Senator Heflin received practically 100,000 votes, as I recall the figures, in that election. We naturally know, therefore, that he had friends and followers all over the State, and it would have been easy for them to have found out if there had been any widespread fraud.

They have county organizations, and he had the list, so that he could let his supporters know the names of the voters and say, "Find out how these people voted." And here we have the Associated Press report, we have the list of voters marked, given them seven months ago; we have, in addition to that, the statements of their watchers themselves, who were put there charged with the duty, and who found no fraud; and yet it is said here is such a case that the Senate, which is supposed to be impartial and nonpartisan, should stand on the uncertain ground of overturning the will of the electorate of Alabama merely because the election managers failed to observe the technicalities of the law.

I have in my possession a list of the election officers showing, county by county, how many Senator Heflin had and how many Senator Bankhead had. This list has been checked up according to the ballots here, and we find that of the election inspectors, there being three in each polling place, there were 2,365 for Senator Bankhead and 1,095 for Senator Heflin; not voting 348. As to the clerks, we find 1,217 for Senator Bankhead and 986 for Senator Heflin, and 233 not voting. We find a total of 3,808 inspectors and 2,416 clerks; 62.1 per cent of the inspectors voted for Senator Bankhead and 28.8 per cent for Senator Heflin; while of the clerks there were 50.4 per cent who voted for Senator Bankhead and 40 per cent who voted for Senator Heflin, 9 per cent not voting.

There are two other most significant facts, and then I am through with reference to the evidence.

In the first place, six different kinds of ballots have been referred to. There is the official count, the committee recount, the three counties where the ballots were burned, the boxes reported by the agents as sealed, the unnumbered ballots, and the temporarily rejected ballots. I want to read you the percentages showing how those votes went in each case.

On the official ballot Senator Bankhead received 59.9 per cent and Senator Heflin 40.1 per cent.

On the committee recount Senator Bankhead received 60.11 per cent and Senator Heflin 38.89 per cent.

In the three counties where the ballots were burned Senator Bankhead received 59.65 per cent and Senator Heflin 40.35 per cent.

In the case of the boxes where the agents reported they were sealed there were 59.54 per cent for Bankhead and 40.46 per cent for Heflin.

Of the unnumbered ballots there were 57.5 per cent for Senator Bankhead and 42.95 per cent for Senator Heflin.

Of the temporarily rejected ballots there were 56.44 per cent for Senator Bankhead, and 43.56 per cent for Senator Heflin.

Take any class of the ballots you choose—those that were in the boxes, sealed and locked, those that were in the boxes unlocked, those that were marked with a pencil, those that were marked with a pen, those that were folded and those that were rolled; take them all, and you will find the percentage runs practically uniformly the same through the State.

What is the reply to that? Some one has said, "A state-wide conspiracy." What are you going to do with the more than a thousand election inspectors and practically 2,000 clerks who were out there representing Senator Heflin? Where do they come into the picture on the question of a State-wide conspiracy? With these people there at the polls, loyal to Senator Heflin, watching out for his interests, appointed to represent him, can it be true, can it be thought possible even by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], because they folded instead of rolled, and wrote with a pencil instead of a pen, that they entered into a state-wide conspiracy to defraud Senator Heflin of his seat?

Why, Mr. President, the committee went down to Alabama and took the evidence of witnesses. Every man who took the stand who was a watcher or an election manager or clerk for Senator Heflin was asked the question whether he knew of any fraud. I challenge the record to find where they have given anything on which fraud can be hung. It is not there. We have exhausted every recourse. We have gone to their own election managers and their own clerks. We have gone to their watchers. We have gone to their county managers. It has been shown that some of the reports for the various counties have been sent to Senator Heflin's attorneys, and yet they have not presented to the Senate anything more significant or more important than trivial violations of directory provisions of a statute.

There is one other thing: We have here tally sheets. They were brought up here. They were checked off here by the supervisor. Not only were they checked with reference to the senatorial election, but they were checked all the way up and down the line for State, county, district, and circuit offices. That was done, as I understand, at the request of Senator Bankhead. These tally sheets were checked against the certificate of result. They tell their own story. If, by the wildest flight of the imagination, it could be conceived that they had taken votes away from Senator Heflin and deprived him of his seat, they took them away from every other officer in the State and every county officer.

Such a thing did not occur. They check just as anyone would know they would check. Everything in this case shows, beyond the peradventure of a doubt, that Senator Bankhead was elected in Alabama by a majority of practically 50,000 votes.

There appears in the hearings, part 2, page 396, the record of what happened in the Republican counties in Alabama. It shows the way they voted both in 1928 and in 1930.

It will be found that in Chilton County Smith received 1,402 votes, Hoover 3,186, Bankhead 1,280, and Heflin 1,768. In other words, it shows that the Republicans in that county, in the main, just did not vote at all.

In Cullman County and in De Kalb County and in St. Clair County and in Winston County the vote likewise is given on page 396 of the hearings, part 2.

In Cullman County Smith received 1,574 votes, Hoover 2,959, Bankhead 2,152, and Heflin 1,947.

In De Kalb County Smith received 3,957 votes, Hoover 5,761, Bankhead 3,958, and Heflin 4,411. Smith had received 3,957, and Bankhead received 3,958. In other words, in De Kalb County Mr. Bankhead received one more vote than Smith had received in 1928, while Senator Heflin received about 1,300 fewer voted than Mr. Hoover had in that county.

Hoover's majority in these five counties was 7,967. The Heflin majority in these five counties was 1,725. The difference in the Hoover and Heflin majorities was 6,242. These were Republican counties, showing that in the main the Republicans just did not vote in that particular case. The election officers were appointed by them.

Mr. President, in so far as I am concerned, I have now covered those features of the charges that have heretofore been made. I take the position that in so far as the law of this case is concerned, it is clear. There can be no shadow of doubt left in the mind of any fair individual who studies this record as to who was elected in Alabama.

Alabama has been charged from this floor, and by public statements made by a Member on this floor, with corruption; and yet the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], who is the chairman of the subcommittee making this unfavorable report, has admitted on the floor that he had no evidence on which to base it. The charge did not fall from his lips, but from the lips of the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], that fraud and corruption and rottenness were shown in every precinct in Alabama. I challenge his statement. He has not read the evidence. The evidence is contained in these several volumes; and he could not find any basis for the statement except in a few of the petty little trivialities that are found here.

For instance, the charge was made, and heralded all over the United States, that it had been found that one dead man had been voted; and even after the man had been produced and had testified on the witness stand, another interview was given out by the Senator from Delaware saying that if this man had told the truth he had violated the law. Either he had violated it or the other man had violated it, because, he said, if there were two, one of them was an election manager.

How did the Senator reach that conclusion? Some of the diligent activity which has been supplying him with information has found where a John W. Moore had served as election manager in a precinct in Jefferson County, and straightway the Senator gave to the press a statement that this John W. Moore had violated the law by serving as an election manager in Jefferson County and voting in Shelby. Straightway he received telegrams from the two John W. Moores demanding a public apology. So far as I have seen, that has never been printed; but he did admit before the committee that he had wired down to the marshal and found out that he was incorrect.

This shows how wrong and how unjust it is to make charges against the people of a State and the election officers of a State when you have not the facts to back them up, but you jump at inferences from a similarity of names.

All through this record they have declared votes illegal. They even set aside the vote of a candidate for the Democratic nomination for governor in the last primary. He happened to be a probate judge of the State, and he had moved from one precinct to another; and in this list of 30,000 so-called illegal votes will be found the name of Judge J. A. Carney of Coffee County, the probate judge who had moved from Elba to Enterprise, and whose name had not been changed on the list. You will find also, in the list of votes that the Senator says are illegal, the probate judge of Shelby County, who had moved from one precinct to another; and when they failed to find his name in the precinct where he voted, they set it aside as an illegal vote. You will find, and I have the case in one record I have here, that the wife of the probate judge of Macon County, Ala., had her ballot set aside as illegal because forsooth they gave her name according to the initials of her husband, and it appeared on the record according to her given name.

That is the kind of "illegal" votes that make up the 30,000 that have been heralded throughout the country as casting reflections upon the election officers in the State of Alabama.

Mr. President, the time is here when the Senate can decide for itself whether it believes that people should sit in the Senate who have been elected or whether they should have their seats taken away from them because of technicalities and the piling up of thousands and thousands of irregularities.

It reminds me of a statement that I read many years ago in Mr. Wigmore's most excellent work on evidence, where he was commenting on the reversal of criminal cases on trivial and technical grounds. He said that the judges of America reminded him of a crowd of African fetish worshipers who were bowing down at the shrine of technicality instead of trying to get to the justice of the case and to try cases upon their merits. He pointed out instances where indictments on serious charges had been quashed in States for the failure to dot an "i," or for leaving out a single letter of a word, and where people have escaped just punishment on account of technicalities like that.

As I have heard presented the petty, trivial, small, trifling, airy charges, running up into the hundreds of thousands, as to whether a person voted with a pencil or with a pen, or whether somebody folded a ballot instead of rolling a ballot, I have thought that Mr. Wigmore, if he were to write another treatise, could refer again to the African fetish worshipers bowing at the shrine of form instead of substance.

There is only one thing for the Senate to decide, and there is only one thing it will decide: Who was elected in Alabama? As it did in the Mayfield case, the Senate will discard these trivialities, it will brush aside these technicalities. Whether the Senator from Delaware wants to do so or not, it will look behind the rolled ballot; it will say, "Who was the choice of the people whose ballots were rolled? Who was the choice of the people whose ballots were folded?" It will not determine finally and base its decision upon whether an Alabama farmer took a fountain pen to the polls to mark the ballots or whether he used the old-fashioned pencil, which the farmer of Alabama knows so well. It will ask, "When this ballot was cast, was it for Heflin or for Bankhead?"

That is the only issue, and I submit, as Senators view this record, measured by everything in the world lawyers can demand as to proof or taken according to the layman's viewpoint, simply upon the fairness and justice and equity of the case, there can be but one result, one irresistible conclusion, and that is that approximately 60 per cent of the voters of Alabama put their cross marks in front of Senator Bankhead's name, and approximately 40 per cent of the voters of that State put their cross marks in front of Senator Heflin's name, and Alabama claims its right, just as does Delaware, or Illinois, or Indiana, to send a Senator of its own choosing, selected by its own people, to the Senate of the United States.

I can not close my remarks without expressing my gratification that after a long, painstaking, and critical examination, which has been made of the election in Alabama, with all the charges that have been hurled all over the Nation, there has been no evidence of illegal expenditure of money. I am glad to say that with all that has been done, with all the microscopes which have been used, there has not yet been brought to the Senate any evidence which justifies even a reasonable inference that expenditures were corruptly made. Of all the terrible things which can be done the worst in a democracy, in my judgment, is corrupting the electorate of a nation by bribing them with money. There is nothing under the shining sun which, in my judgment, constitutes a more severe crime or can be a more severe indictment against the people than the fact that there is corruption through the unlawful expenditure of money.

Yet, Mr. President, after an examination of more than a year, with a committee that was certainly willing to get everything it could, we come before this body and the spokesman for the minority report does not present a single instance to show that money was corruptly used in the Alabama election.

Mr. President, I close my presentation of this case with the simple statement that Alabama is proud of her record as a State. She takes just pride in the achievements of her sons and of her daughters.

We are proud of the fact that after a thorough and complete examination they find that we have had an election which stands the scrutiny of its critics, and where the man who speaks for the minority must stand and charge our people with no more serious crime than that the nonexpert election managers dared to contravene the laws of this Nation and reach into their pockets and get pencils instead of pens with which to mark the ballots and that some of them folded the ballots when the law has said they must roll them.

I submit the case to the Senate with the sincere hope and with the belief that there can not be secured on the other side of this Chamber votes sufficient to give a partisan flavor to the unseating of a man when it is shown by every particle of proof that John H. Bankhead was elected by a majority of 50,000 of the sovereign voters of a sovereign State.

DEMAND TO WITHDRAW AMERICAN MARINES IN NICARAGUA—PROTEST THE KILLING BY NICARAGUAN SOLDIERS OF THE AMERICAN OFFICERS AND MEN

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I do not rise to participate in the discussion of the Alabama election case, which I understand is to be resumed Monday. I want to congratulate all the Senators who have been discussing it upon what is very evident—a display of energy, industry, and great ability.

Mr. President, I want the privilege of the Senate for a couple of minutes that I might attract attention to what I feel is a great tragedy. In my home, in the village of Highland Park, at the city of Chicago, there are mothers, sisters, little ones, who must record their mourning in tears on the murder of their blood beloved, the United States marines in Nicaragua on yesterday. I beg to call to the attention of the Senate the fact that there can be no justification tendered from any source within the spirit of our Constitution nor the principles of our Government, within the theory for which this America is established, to excuse, far less to justify, the theory upon which this Government has launched these American soldiers and send down to distant foreign lands its young men—the heroic members of its marines, as pledges with their lives as additional security to private bankers, whose money, being lent upon an adventure in that country for excessive interest, under conditions of most exaggerated premiums—and this, our Nation, to lend the lives of its sons as this human pledge for the securing of this money. Thus we risk them where in the conflict they must die and be brought back in coffins to the bemoan-ing house of misery and agony of their homes. And as to the reason why they were in Nicaragua, and where they were set upon, it must be answered that it was by those who felt they were justified in repelling an aggression from strangers, our people, sir, up to the present time all we get from our Government as explanation—with the expiration of nearly 24 hours—is the fact that these men were engaged in repelling what they claim was an invasion or assault by those of Nicaragua who are charged in Nicaragua with being "irregulars."

In other words—let us be to the point—we, of the United States, have assumed to establish a political administration in a distant foreign country, in Central America, particularly in Nicaragua, in order that one political administration shall be maintained there as against its rivals, because our favorite, chosen as such, is under some pledge that it will guarantee the payment of the debts which have been incurred in Nicaragua in behalf of American private banking interests of the United States. We pledge the lives of our young men and of our soldiers as collection agencies in behalf of these private interests until these American young men are murdered, and their mangled bodies brought back to their loved ones, to whom the only reply America can make—when her American citizens are thus disposed of in such ruthless, cruel, and inhuman manner—is that they have lent their children to sustain an administration of a distant country in power because the officials of that political power have promised to secure the return of money of private interests which has been lent within that land.

Mr. President, I protest against it. I protest in behalf of America. We have made an enemy of nearly every country of South and Central America, by our course. Our Nation has not a friend in any republic of Central or South America. La Prensa, the great publication of Buenos Aires, came out only shortly denouncing what we call our Monroe doctrine, because of these adventures of trespass on our part, which they claim are part of a movement by the United States to take possession by force of these States of Central America.

Mr. President, the distinguished ex-Secretary of State, now the Chief Justice of the United States, had to listen to himself hissed in Habana at a Pan American meet, and before the world, our country was held up as enduring that scorn and contumely because of conduct of the United States that had transpired in Haiti and Santo Domingo similar to this invasion which has been directed in Nicaragua.

We learn no lessons, we profit by no example, we multiply our conduct of trespass and invasion, we inherit the consequence upon America. We have now reached the point where, coolly and calmly, we endure the murder of children of America by foreign forces without even a protest.

Mr. President, if there be no other voice, I lift my own to register the protest of an American official against this affront to the American justice of our land. I ask, sir, that there shall be some course taken from official authority directing our Government and this administration to return to American principles; withdraw the marines, bring them home, let them be in America, let them be used to defend America, where America is assailed, but let our soldiers return to their country.

If these private bankers desire to lend their money to these countries, that is for them. Then let them take such steps to protect their securities as our American bankers are only permitted if they lend anywhere in the United States or Europe—to the courts of the country, or whatever source of help they may seek by private means. But let us end this using the children of America as extra pledges to the security of the private bankers, the forfeit of the pledge being the lives of these sons of our land. Mr. President, thereafter we may move once again toward reviving the friendship of South and Central America and thus justify the policy of the Monroe doctrine and reestablish that friendship which we sought to extend them in the hope that reciprocity might avail, which in trade or in kindliness would greatly profit us.

Mr. President, I thank the Senate for allowing me this moment, and particularly the assistant leader of the majority, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], permitting displacing the program that I might assert my protest against longer continuing existing conditions such as I denounce. I express my hope and my plea for my country to return to American principles for the preservation of American lives under the just doctrines of an American constitutional government.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn until Monday next at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 3 o'clock p. m.) adjourned until Monday, April 25, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, APRIL 23, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father, who art the guide of mankind, wilt Thou let Thy providence bring forth in our own beloved land the fruits of righteousness, contentment, and prosperity? Bless us with the wonderful graces of the Master—with His courage, with His forbearance, and with His sympathy for all men. May all nations be united in faith and hope. Take out of every conflict the sting of bitterness, of selfishness, that a true feeling of brotherhood and cooperation may be felt throughout the world. May prejudice flee away, may all suspicion disappear, and may all peoples come to the knowledge of the Lord God as their Heavenly Father upon earth. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

APPOINTMENT OF GRADUATES OF NAVAL ACADEMY, 1932

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 8083) providing for the appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy of all midshipmen who graduate from the Naval Academy in 1932, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. I have consulted the ranking minority member on the committee, and this request is agreeable to him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 8083, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Page 1, line 7, strike out "until after 1936."
Page 1, line 9, after "officers" where it appears the first time, insert "otherwise authorized by law."
Page 1, line 10, after "computation," insert "and shall be excluded from any computation made for the purpose of determining the authorized number of line officers in any grade on the active list above the grade of lieutenant, junior grade, until the total number of line officers shall have been reduced below the number otherwise authorized by law."
Page 1, after line 10, insert:
"SEC. 2. That all commissions hereafter issued as ensigns in the line of the Navy, second lieutenants in the Marine Corps, and in the lowest commissioned grades of the Staff Corps of the Navy with the rank of ensign, may be revoked by the Secretary of the Navy, under such regulations as he may prescribe, at any time during a period of two years from the dates of such commissions, and each officer whose commission is so revoked shall be discharged from the service with not more than one year's pay. The rank of such officers of the same date of commission among themselves at the end of said period shall be determined by boards of officers under such rules as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, and the recommendations of such boards shall be final when approved by him."
"SEC. 3. That after January 1, 1933, the number of midshipmen allowed at the United States Naval Academy for each Senator, Representative, Delegate in Congress, Resident Commissioner from Porto Rico, and the District of Columbia, by the act of July 11, 1919 (41 Stat. 140; U. S. C., title 34, sec. 1032), shall be reduced to two: Provided, That nothing herein shall exclude from the United States Naval Academy any midshipman appointed thereto prior to January 1, 1933."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act providing for the appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy of all midshipmen who graduate from the Naval Academy, and for other purposes."

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it is impossible for anyone to know just what those amendments mean, except the provision for the reduction of cadets from three to two, with which I am in accord.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I shall explain exactly what the Senate amendments do. They propose to grant commissions to all midshipmen who graduate in future years, irrespective of whether or not we need them, and after they have put them in the fleet, leave discretion with the Secretary to weed them out. The amendments further propose to reduce the midshipmen from 2 to 3 years, to change the law as it is from 5 to 2, and make it permanently 2. The thought in my mind is this: This is a matter which should go to conference, because I am thoroughly of the opinion that there is no justification for Congress at this time going on record as saying that irrespective of whether we need the midshipmen they will get commissions. I think a conference report should be submitted permitting 50 per cent commissions to be granted, and 50 per cent in the years to come, until the number is brought down within the 4 per cent provided by law. That is the reason I am asking that it go to conference.

Mr. BYRNS. As the gentleman knows, I was very much opposed to the bill as it originally passed the House, because I have never believed that it is proper to commission 261 young men who have graduated when the department itself says that it has no need for them. I believe it is an unnecessary and unjustifiable expense and a charge upon the Treasury for the next 30 or 40 years. However, the House has acted upon that, as has the Senate. I do not think we should go any farther, however.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I agree with the gentleman. If we adopt the Senate amendments as they are, it means that next year and the year after and the year after every midshipman who graduates gets his commission. I am opposed to that. I want only enough midshipmen to be put into the service that the Navy requires, and that is the reason I asked to go to conference.

Mr. BYRNS. With that understanding, I have no objection.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman understands this, that the Senate amendments mean that the present graduating class, every one of them, will get their commissions; but there is discretionary power in the Secretary after probably two years at sea to weed out 50 per cent. The reason for commissioning the whole class now is because it may so happen that a boy who was at the foot of the class this year will develop and be a superior officer to the one who graduates with a higher rank.

Mr. BYRNS. That applies to the class which will graduate in June?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. The House and the Senate have already approved that.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. No; the House has not. It approved the proposition to give everyone his commission and let him stay in the Navy, irrespective of any probationary period.

Mr. BYRNS. Whatever I may think about the fact that 261 ensigns are going to be put into the service when they are not needed, according to the statement of the Navy Department, does not now matter, for that is behind us. As I understand, the Senate amendment to which the gentleman refers will to a certain extent relieve that.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is correct.

Mr. BYRNS. By giving the Secretary the right to weed them out.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes; and it goes one step farther and commissions future classes irrespective of whether we need them or not.

Mr. BYRNS. And the gentleman is opposed to that?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I am.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Has the gentleman ever worked out in his own mind some kind of a provision that when these graduates are commissioned, should they be retired within a period of one year, the Government will not be called upon to give them retirement pay for the balance of their lives?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. If they go out under the Senate amendment they will go out with one year's pay and will not be placed upon the retired list.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Reserving the right further to object, is it the gentleman's desire, if this bill should go to conference, to give each one of the conferees the opportunity of sitting in on all of the deliberations?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Of course, it would be no conference unless each Member had a right to participate. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC] will be a member of the conference committee, and I assure the gentleman he will have ample opportunity to express his views there and in the House also.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. It has been the policy in the past for two or three to get together and agree upon a report and then notify the other members afterwards.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That does not apply where I serve upon a conference committee.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. Following the question by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], the gentleman, of course, knows that under the McClintic amendment to the House bill these boys graduating from the academy can not possibly go above the grade of ensign no matter how long they stay in the service.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Surely.

Mr. BROWNING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. BROWNING. Did I understand the gentleman to say he was in accord with that part of the Senate amendment which permitted the Secretary of the Navy to weed out certain officers?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I am; and to prohibit other classes from graduating unless they are needed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. VINSON of Georgia, McCLINTIC of Oklahoma, DREWRY, BRITTEN, and DARROW.

PRINTING HEARINGS BEFORE THE SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, there is a concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 25) introduced by Senator SMOOT for certain printing that is needed very badly by the committee of the Senate, and I now call up that resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate concurrent resolution, as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 25

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the printing act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Finance of the Senate be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed 1,500 additional copies of the consolidated hearings held before the committee during the current session on the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The Senate concurrent resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON MANUFACTURES

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up another concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 18) and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate concurrent resolution, as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 18

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the printing act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Manufactures of the Senate be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed 3,000 additional copies of the hearings held before the committee during the current session on the establishment of a national economic council.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STEVENSON: Page 1, line 5, strike out the word "three" and insert the word "one."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Senate concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS TO CERTAIN SOLDIERS AND SAILORS OF THE CIVIL WAR, ETC.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 11290) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill.

This bill is a substitute for the following House bills referred to this committee:

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. UNDERWOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NAVY DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11452) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11452, the Navy Department appropriation bill, with Mr. FULLER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending which was offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC], which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma: Page 42, line 1, after the word "librarian," strike out the figures "$269,000" and insert "$200,000."

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday I attempted to get some information relative to the number of civilians, the number of instructors, and other information with respect to the Naval Academy in comparison with the amount that is now being expended at the Military Academy. When the House adjourned on yesterday no one present was able to give that information.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. AYRES. I will be glad to give the gentleman the information as best I can at this particular time.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I have the information here now.

Mr. AYRES. I had the information here yesterday, but it was out of my possession when the question came up.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I have some information that I respectfully wish to bring to the House.

At the present time there are 76 civilian teachers at the Naval Academy and 164 officers in comparison with 8 civilian teachers at West Point and 182 officers.

The appropriation last year for the Naval Aacdemy at Annapolis for teachers was $290,000 and for West Point $46,000. Anyone can clearly see that the ratio or proportion is entirely out of line. When we take into consideration the fact that there is strong probability that each Member of Congress will have his number of appointees reduced to two next year, really the amendment which I have offered should have provided for a greater reduction than it calls for.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. AYRES. I should like to ask the gentleman if he is not aware of the fact that the amount he gave applied to but eight professors or civilian officers at West Point, while the figure he gave for Annapolis applies to 74 civilian instructors?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. The gentleman is absolutely correct as to the 74 civilian instructors. Page 752 of the House hearings gives the table.

Mr. AYRES. Let me ask another question: Does not that account for the discrepancy in the amounts appropriated for the two institutions?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. No; not in the proper ratio, because you have $46,000 against $290,000 without that ratio in the actual number of teachers employed. There are 240 instructors in the Naval Academy as against 185 instructors in the Military Academy.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. In a minute.

The point I want to bring out is that the people of the country expect us to reduce expenditures. At the present rate we are appropriating for a sufficient number of teachers and employees to take care of five appointees for each Member of Congress. The number of appointees has been gradually reduced from five to three, and next year we will probably only have two. Surely the House should be willing to reduce this expenditure in the sum of $69,000, which would still leave $200,000 for this purpose.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. AYRES. May I ask the gentleman, when he speaks of next year if he means the fiscal year 1933?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I mean the year to which this conference report will be applicable, the one brought to the attention of the House this morning.

Mr. AYRES. The reduction to two appointments would not be applicable until the year 1934, so that question should not enter into the 1933 bill that we are considering at this time.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. AYRES. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the further fact that 2 of the 76 civilian instructors the gentleman spoke of a moment ago will be eliminated by the department itself, and this bill calls for a further elimination of 5.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I am glad to have the information, because I am sure that the chairman is trying to reach the same results I am; but I further want to call his attention to the fact that the present ratio of appropriations to take care of teachers in the two schools is about 6 to 1. In other words, it costs six times more money to maintain the teachers for the Naval Academy at Annapolis than it does to maintain the teachers for the Military Academy at West Point.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I ask for an additional five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. AYRES. Does the gentleman realize that at West Point there are but 1,200 cadets?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I was about to call attention to that.

Mr. AYRES. While at Annapolis we have 1,900 students.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. The gentleman is correct. That makes a difference of only 600 in the total, yet the ratio in expenses is vastly over one-third. In other words, we should not be called upon to appropriate for a greater number of teachers than is necessary to take care of the difference in the number of students at Annapolis. Instead of that we are asked to appropriate this year the sum of $269,000. My amendment proposes that that amount be reduced to $200,000. It is a slight reduction and not in keeping with the same ratio that applies to West Point.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Since it appears from the statement the gentleman has made that instructors at both of the academies embrace civilian and officer instructors, the officer instructors at West Point exceeding those at Annapolis——

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Only by eight.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think by more than that; it would be about 28.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I should have said 18.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The officer instructors, I am informed, at West Point exceed the officer instructors at Annapolis by 28. However, since the number of boys at Annapolis are about 50 per cent more than at West Point, I think you will find that the costs are fairly well apportioned between the two schools.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I regret exceedingly I can not agree with the gentleman, because the ratio between Annapolis and West Point does not justify an expenditure of six times more money to take care of teachers at Annapolis than it does to take care of teachers at West Point.

That being true, it does seem to me that this House should proceed along business lines and take into consideration the number of students that are at each one of these schools and supply for these students a sufficient number of teachers and no more. That is the reason that I have asked that this appropriation be reduced in the sum of $69,000, which is justifiable, according to the figures that I have given.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. I heartily agree with the gentleman that the House should proceed along businesslike lines. With that in view, I should like to ask the gentleman which of the professors or instructors at the Naval Academy he would do away with under his $69,000 reduction?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I shall be very glad to answer that. I am sure if this appropriation is reduced to $200,000, we have at the head of the Navy Department sufficient brains to equalize matters in such a way as to maintain present efficiency.

Mr. BRITTEN. What does the gentleman mean by equalizing brains at the Naval Academy?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I did not say at the Naval Academy. I said the head of the Navy.

Mr. BRITTEN. How is the gentleman going to determine which professors or which instructors shall be eliminated from the service by this arbitrary deduction of $69,000?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. The gentleman knows full well that whenever you reduce expenditures applicable to any bureau or department of the Government that those in charge of it immediately make the necessary readjustments so as to maintain efficiency and at the same time leave the situation in accord with the amount appropriated.

Mr. BRITTEN. I understood the gentleman to say he desired to have a businesslike procedure, but the gentleman does not know which of the instructors or professors he would do away with at the academy, but he would leave that to the discretion of the department.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Certainly; and that is the only sensible way it can be brought about.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. My information is that at West Point we have 1,236 students and at Annapolis 2,003.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. We only have about 1,800 at Annapolis.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. We have at West Point 192 officers as instructors; at Annapolis 164, making a difference of 28. Officer and civilian instructors at West Point number 198 for 1,236 boys, while the number of officers and civilian instructors at Annapolis is 240 for 2,003 boys.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. The gentleman's figures are slightly different from those given to me by the department this morning. But regardless of that fact, the gentleman can not justify an appropriation amounting to six or seven times more to take care of the teachers at Annapolis than is being appropriated for West Point.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The error which the gentleman falls into is this: That there are 28 more officers at West Point than at Annapolis engaged in teaching.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Eighteen.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. There are 28, according to the statement furnished me by the department.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. According to my figures the number is 18.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It would be well to see what the pay of officers at West Point is and what the pay of officers at Annapolis is, and then you should take into account the large increase in the number of students at Annapolis over the number at West Point.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. The gentleman's figures are not exactly accurate, because the chairman of the subcommittee has made the statement that there are only about 1,800 students at Annapolis.

I want to say further to the committee that my only purpose in bringing this to your attention is to see whether or not the House wants to put into effect some economy. If the committee does wish to put some economy into effect, it will vote for this amendment; otherwise, it will vote it down.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The purpose of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma is to reduce the appropriation for the civilian professors at the Naval Academy at Annapolis from $269,000 to $200,000, an arbitrary reduction which does not take into consideration the fact that the Budget reduced the amount allowed to the Naval Academy by $114,000 and following that the Subcommittee on Appropriations reduced the amount by $28,000, a total reduction of about $142,000.

The subject brought up by the gentleman from Oklahoma must have been one which was familiar to him because I have before me the hearings of the Committee on Naval Affairs of February 1, 1932, when the gentleman from Oklahoma made this statement, when Admiral Upham, Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, was on the stand.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. What page?

Mr. GAMBRILL. Page 751.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I notice the Naval Academy has an appropriation of $290,000 to take care of professors, and when you compare that with the Military Academy, which uses only $46,561 to pay instructors, why should the ratio be so much higher at the Naval Academy than at the Military Academy when the number of students is not sufficiently greater to warrant this difference in cost?

At the invitation of the gentleman from Oklahoma, Admiral Upham, the Chief of the Bureau of Navigation, put in those hearings a statement showing that there were 76 civilian professors at the Naval Academy who receive an aggregate salary of $290,000, or an average pay of $3,810. The hearings disclose that at West Point there are six civilian employees, their total pay being $17,320. Now, manifestly, gentlemen, when you have 76 professors at the Naval Academy as compared with 6 civilian professors at West Point it accounts for the difference between the appropriation made for the Naval Academy of $269,000 for the pay of civilian professors as against $46,561, as stated by the gentleman from Oklahoma, allowed for civilian professors at West Point.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAMBRILL. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. The gentleman's statement is correct with respect to the hearings; but when the information was given, it was not known to the members of the committee until after the hearings were printed. Furthermore, it is shown that West Point is utilizing officers that are in the pay of the Government to take care of the students, which is a great saving, while Annapolis employs civilians to perform a service which could be performed by naval officers, if they are properly qualified.

Mr. GAMBRILL. I think a complete answer to the statement made by the gentleman from Oklahoma is to be found in the fact that the ratio of instructors to students at West Point is 16 per cent and at Annapolis 12 per cent.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAMBRILL. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It is well that new Members of Congress understand that the civilian instructors at Annapolis are there because Congress placed them there, and some six or eight years ago there was an annual controversy in the Senate and the House as to how we could retain the civilian instructors at Annapolis. It was thought to be so important that a proviso was carried in every appropriation bill to the effect that the pay of certain administrative officers should be denied them if the number of civilian instructors were reduced.

Mr. GAMBRILL. I am glad to have the gentleman's contribution. That is in accordance with my recollection of the appropriation bill.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC] does not prevail.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, the amount carried in the bill as reported by the committee is $269,000 for the pay of the civilian instructors and professors at Annapolis.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma proposes to strike out $69,000 and thus reduce the amount to $200,000. The gentleman rests the argument for his amendment upon the fact that we are appropriating six or seven times as much as we appropriate for the same purpose at West Point.

The whole question turns upon two factors.

In the first place, at West Point the enrollment is about 1,236 and at Annapolis at this time it is about 1,750. This fact, however, as important as it is, is a small factor.

The other factor is this: We are employing at Annapolis a larger number of civilian instructors because we detail there a less number of officer instructors.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. Not at just this moment.

At West Point we have six instructors who are civilians. We have eight officer instructors who have permanent detail as I understand, by act of Congress, to instructional work at the academy. We have 192 officers detailed to West Point for tour duty, or a grand total of 206 members of the faculty. At Annapolis we have 164 officer and 76 civilian instructors, or a total of 240. It will be noted that the ratio of total instructors is less at Annapolis rather than greater than the ratio of enrollment bears to West Point.

The reason we have a larger number of civilian instructors at Annapolis is because of certain types of instructional work that long experience in the Navy has indicated can be handled better by civilian instructors than by officers of the Navy. These instructors are trained educators who are making it their career to follow the profession they are following at Annapolis.

It is because of this, gentlemen, that a mistake would be made if we attempted in this arbitrary manner to lop off about one-third or one-fourth of the instructors at Annapolis and increase—because it would mean this—the number of officers of the Navy detailed for instruction work.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I yield.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Following the gentleman's line of argument that these men have been placed there to perform a life work, let us suppose that we are going to reduce the number of appointees to two——

Mr. FRENCH. Then we can take care of it next year.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. But the same argument would apply to what the gentleman has just stated. We would then have to maintain the appropriation and keep the same number we have there now or make some other arrangement to reduce the number.

Mr. FRENCH. I am not sure I understood all the gentleman said, because there is so much confusion in the Chamber——

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I carried out the gentleman's argument to apply to a situation where each Member of Congress would only have two appointees. When that situation arises, what would the gentleman do with these civilian instructors, which the gentleman has brought to our attention, and has stated have been trained for a long time and that we can not reduce their number.

Mr. FRENCH. Of course, when that condition arises, if it should arise, we could reduce the number; but not now, and not until the condition shall arise.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I am sure the gentleman and myself are trying to reach the same result.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in two minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I think this matter has been very clearly and quite fully explained to the committee. The amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma provides for an arbitrary deduction of $69,000, irrespective of its effect upon the academy. Apparently this is unimportant.

Answering the gentleman's argument that we have a greater number of civilian instructors at the Naval Academy than at West Point, all we have to do is to realize that West Point has 33⅓ per cent more officers than the Naval Academy, based upon the total number of students in the institutions.

The gentleman's argument about reducing the number of civilian instructors in the event our appointments to the academy are reduced from three to two, is as illogical as for some one to say that for a 4-room school building but two teachers would be necessary, if the pupils in those four rooms were materially reduced.

Mr. Chairman, pursuant to a request for information with regard to the number of officers, enlisted men, instructors, and civil employees at Annapolis and West Point, I hold in my hand a tabulation which has been made up in the Bureau of Navigation and which represents the most accurate comparison to be had.

The information with regard to West Point was obtained from data furnished to Congressman AYRES under date of March 31, 1932, by the Secretary of War, supplemented by information obtained by telephone from the Adjutant General's Department. The data for Annapolis was obtained in part from the data submitted by the superintendent, and which is contained in the hearings on the appropriation bill, in part from the quarterly reports of civilian personnel, and in part from the list of officers who are on duty at the academy. The tabulation includes all civilian personnel who are paid for by the Federal Government, but excludes a small number of civilians who are employed by the Midshipmen's Athletic Association, the midshipmen's store, and the midshipmen's laundry, and so forth. It will be noted that there are a considerably greater number of civilian employees at Annapolis than at West Point, and a considerably larger number of enlisted men at West Point than at Annapolis. This is probably due to the fact that the course at Annapolis is far more concerned with machinery, both steam and electrical, as well as the internal combustion engine, than is the course at West Point. The comparison is given in the table below:

	West Point	Annapolis
(1) Cadets or midshipmen	1,236	2,003
(2) Enlisted personnel	1,155	640
(3) Civilian employees	447	1,029
(4) Total enlisted personnel and civilian employees	1,602	1,669
(5) Officers	227	246
(6) Officers as instructors or professors	192	164
(7) Civilians as instructors or professors	6	76
(8) Officers and civilian instructors and professors	198	240
(9) Ratio of instructors to students, per cent	16	12

The gentleman is entirely in error, and I hope his amendment will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of employees at rates to be fixed by the Secretary of of the Navy, $577,387.

Mr. COYLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask a question of the chairman of the subcommittee. In lines 4 and 5 on page 42, should not there be included the same amendment to apply to the comptroller's decision regarding the limitation in class 4 (b), I think it is, that appears elsewhere in the bill?

Mr. AYRES. We were not so informed by the Navy Department.

Mr. COYLE. It was my impression from a memorandum from the department that such an amendment should go in, but I got it at a late date.

Now, may I at this time address a further inquiry to the chairman of the subcommittee with reference to the item on page 23, which was amended yesterday in connection with page 25. If the chairman remembers, in the item on page 23 the total amount was increased by about $7,000, to provide for the increase in the reserve pay that was necessary to take care of the removal of the flight-pay limitation. In addition, the total amount of flight pay was limited to $1,014,000. It was rather my understanding—I may have been under a misapprehension—that the increase in flight pay was going to be taken out of the total appropriation for pay of the Navy, rather than put in as entirely a limitation of flight pay.

Mr. AYRES. No; I think the gentleman is wrong.

Mr. COYLE. Is the gentleman under the impression that with the omission of the limitation of $1,100 you can have the same number of active aviators on the list without cutting out a considerable number of them, due to the total limit on page 23 of $1,014,000?

Mr. AYRES. That is a question for the department.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I somewhat doubt the propriety of bringing up the matter I am about to present to the members of the committee. It is not directly involved in the pending appropriation bill, yet indirectly it is a matter that involves the Naval Academy as well as the West Point Academy.

You all know that the Government, through the appropriations out of the House, and through private subscription in the city, has expended a large sum of money for the bicentennial celebration. It so happens that I have a personal acquaintanceship with the director of the athletic events that are being prepared to entertain the visitors during the progress of the bicentennial celebration.

It has been suggested to me that inasmuch as there has never been an athletic contest between the football teams of the Navy and Military Academy, and inasmuch as in this Capital City of the Nation we are all interested in the personnel of both branches of the service, especially the boys at the two academies, if it could be arranged, it would be an admirable thing to have a football game between the Naval Academy and West Point in the Capital City of this Nation this year.

The director of athletics has advised me that it will be entirely possible, if he can be assured of the funds or part of the funds at least that would be derived from this game, to construct a stadium in Washington, or rather an addition to the baseball stadium, that would seat at least 40,000 people, and he further assures me that arrangements could be made, if agreeable to the directors of those teams, for a fair division of the receipts. He informs me that his committee is very much in need of funds to carry out the program and that no further demands will be made upon the Congress for appropriations. He also has in mind, if this scheme can be carried out, to arrange to bring to Washington, after their contests in the West, all of the contestants of the Olympic games to be conducted in the West. It seems to me, if it meets with any favorable reaction on the part of the Members of Congress, it would be a fine thing in some way for individual Members to suggest to those in authority that this arrangement might be made, and I have taken the liberty of speaking out of order to bring the suggestion to your minds for your consideration and, I trust, your cooperation.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. FISH. Does the gentleman know anything about the proposed memorial to Theodore Roosevelt? Is not that to be in the form of a stadium?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I can not give any information about that.

Mr. BRITTEN. It is being suggested.

Mr. FISH. I am in hearty sympathy with the suggestion made by the gentleman. I think Washington is the proper and logical place to hold the football game between Annapolis and the Army. Of course, it should be done in a stadium of twice the capacity suggested by the gentleman. You could fill a stadium with a capacity of 80,000 people.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; but it costs a tremendous sum of money to construct a stadium of that size. This is a practical suggestion that I think could be carried into effect. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] is interested in these matters, as are the chairmen of the Committees on Military and Naval Affairs. I am making this suggestion in an entirely informal way, because I thought that possibly if it captured the attention of the House the personal influence of the Members might be used with those who will have the final say in arranging the matter.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, we have read only two lines of the bill so far this afternoon. Many Members of the House are very anxious to get through with the bill this afternoon; and I want it distinctly understood that we are going to complete the bill to-day if it takes until midnight.

Mr. BRITTEN. I hope the gentleman will permit me to speak for five minutes.

Mr. AYRES. Then some other gentleman will want five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I am compelled to object.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma: Page 42, line 5, strike out the figures "$577,387" and insert "$500,000."

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I am earnestly interested in effecting economies wherever they can be accomplished without destroying efficiency. The amendment I offered a few moments ago was voted down because those in charge of the legislation stated to the House that that sum was needed based upon the figures that then existed with respect to teachers. I find in making a comparison between the two academies that there are 518 civilians at the Military Academy and 1,029 at Annapolis. In other words, there are practically twice as many at one school as at the other. The Navy last year appropriated $629,000 and in this bill this has been reduced to $577,000. Taking into consideration the fact that there are 40 per cent more students at the Military Academy than are at Annapolis, if you use that same ratio to take care of the civilians, we would be called upon to appropriate something like $400,000 to take care of the number; so, if there is anything in ratios and figures based on the actual number employed, it does seem to me that my position can be justified in asking for a reduction of $77,387 in this particular item.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. Has the gentleman taken into consideration the fact that there are 1,155 enlisted men at West Point and only 640 at Annapolis?

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. That may be true.

Mr. AYRES. It is true.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I admit it. It certainly ought not to require civilians to look after these enlisted men. Whenever we come to the point where we have to be a wet nurse for the men enlisted in the Army or the Navy it seems to me that something ought to be remedied.

Mr. AYRES. The gentleman knows that 1,185 enlisted men must be doing some work that is being performed by civilians at Annapolis.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I assure the gentleman that I am interested in economy, and I can not understand why it requires $577,387 to take care of 1,029 civilian employees at Annapolis, in comparison with $276,139 to pay 518 civilians at West Point. There is something wrong somewhere.

Mr. AYRES. I am inclined to feel that if all the factors were analized there would not be a wide discrepancy.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. We appropriate nearly three times as much to take care of one school as another when there are only twice as many employed. It seems to me this House is justified in reducing expenditures. Therefore I feel it my duty to present it to the House, and the House can do as it pleases.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Maintenance and repairs, Naval Academy: For necessary repairs of public buildings, wharves, and walls inclosing the grounds of the Naval Academy, accident prevention, improvements, repairs, and fixtures; for books, periodicals, maps, models, and drawings; purchase and repair of fire engines; fire apparatus and plants, machinery; purchase and maintenance of all horses and horse-drawn vehicles for use at the academy, including the maintenance, operation, and repair of three horse-drawn, passenger-carrying vehicles to be used only for official purposes; seeds and plants; tools and repairs of the same; stationery; furniture for Government buildings and offices at the academy, including furniture for midshipmen's rooms; coal and other fuels; candles, oil, and gas; attendance on light and power plants; cleaning and clearing up station and care of buildings; attendance on fires, lights, fire engines, fire apparatus, and plants, and telephone, telegraph, and clock systems; incidental labor; advertising, water tax, postage, telephones, telegrams, tolls, and ferriage; flags and awnings; packing boxes; fuel for heating and lighting bandsmen's quarters; pay of inspectors and draftsmen; music and astronomical instruments; and for pay of employees on leave, $940,000: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for employees assigned to Group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the Schedule of Wages for Civil Employees in the Field Service of the Navy Department shall not exceed $23,000.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

This paragraph dealing with the Naval Academy provides certain expenditures that naturally include athletics. I desire to follow as nearly as possible what has been said to the House by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Let me present the ridiculous situation with regard to athletics between the two academies. No corporation on earth dominated by a set of men sitting together occasionally would permit the present condition to exist for five minutes. I am thinking not only of football, but there are no track events, no contests on the track or in the field or in the gymnasium that have taken place for a number of years between the two branches of the service, the Army and the Navy, because a former superintendent at the Naval Academy got rambunctious one day and put on a high, stiff, white collar and could not see himself or anybody else around him and offended the sensibilities of the West Point men. Since then it has been impossible to bring them together. Congress can bring those two academies together. I think they ought to row against each other; they ought to box against each other; they ought to sprint and run against each other; they ought to wrestle against each other; they ought to play baseball against each other; they ought to play football against each other; and because one superintendent says, "No; not by a long shot; let them come to us," and the other superintendent says, "No; we are not going over there; let them come to us," the attitude of the two institutions is the laughingstock of the country.

We have the greatest athletes in the world at Annapolis and West Point, and I agree with what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] said. They ought to play a game of football every year. They ought reasonably to play it in Washington during the bicentennial celebration.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield.

Mr. AYRES. I suggest that the Committee on Naval Affairs take that up. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRITTEN. That is the first time in 10 years that the Committee on Appropriations has granted anything to the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House, and it is a thankless job.

Mr. AYRES. We think they are fully capable of doing that.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman does not know our weakness. We have been trying for four years to do the very thing the gentleman suggests.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. This is one time the gentleman will find the hearty cooperation of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BRITTEN. But they will not appropriate a dollar for it, I know. Now, I believe the Members of Congress, by persuasion, by calling upon the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, can bring about a resumption of athletic contests between those two academies. I think it ought to be done in the interest of the morale of the two academies. There is nothing that will promote esprit de corps more than having those youngsters meet in boxing, wrestling, rowing, and swimming contests. It makes them the finest kind of friends. There is nothing I would like to see more than to see a young Navy middleweight knock the spots out of an Army middleweight from West Point. It would be a pleasure. It would make good friends of those two boys.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GOSS. And nothing gave me greater pleasure than last fall see the Army mule kick the Navy goat.

Mr. BRITTEN. I knew somebody would say that. But I am certain if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations will speak to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy and aim to show them the unwisdom of the obstinacy of both of those academies at this time we can bring about a football game between the two academies in Washington this year. Why not? We dominate everything that is done at both of the academies. It is silly for us to say that the athletic events of the academies are out of our jurisdiction and we will not interfere and let the academies take care of the matter themselves. They are taking care of the matter in a most foolish way, and the Congress or somebody, the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, can bring them together.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Let the President of the United States do what Calvin Coolidge did in 1926, when it was suggested that Soldiers' Field in Chicago be dedicated by the Army and Navy football game. We could not get those teams together. They would not play elsewhere than on the Atlantic coast. President Coolidge publicly announced that he thought it would be a good thing for the Army and for the Navy if they would play in the mid-West, and they played. Those teams will play in Washington if President Hoover will say he thinks it will be a good thing for them and for the country for them to play here this year.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield.

Mr. BOYLAN. May I ask the gentleman if he would use his good influence with the athletic managers so that Members of Congress might get a seat occasionally at these games instead of getting letters saying, "We regret to say that the demands of the athletic association are such as will preclude the possibility of our selling you any tickets this year"? [Laughter.]

Mr. BRITTEN. I agree with the gentleman. At the last Army and Navy game I had a seat in the fifty-seventh row.

Mr. FISH. Does the gentleman know anything about the purpose of the Roosevelt stadium?

Mr. BRITTEN. In a general way I do. Tentative plans are under way.

Mr. FISH. What is it?

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

PAY, MARINE CORPS

Pay of officers, active list: For pay and allowances prescribed by law for all officers on the active list—pay and allowances, $3,602,277; subsistence allowance, $493,116; rental allowance, $648,063; in all, $4,743,456; and no part of such sum shall be available to pay active-duty pay and allowances to officers on the retired list: Provided, That no person shall be commissioned as an officer in the Marine Corps prior to June 1, 1933: Provided further, That hereafter additional pay for making aerial flights shall in no case be at a rate in excess of $1,100 per annum.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

Mr. GOSS and Mr. BRITTEN reserved a point of order on the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. AYRES: Page 44, line 5, after "$3,602,277," insert "including not to exceed $122,018 for increased pay for making aerial flights."

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, this amendment limits the amount of flying pay to that estimated by the department, $138,148, less the amount taken off by the committee of $16,130, and is offered in conformity with the policy announced yesterday.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield for a question?

Mr. AYRES. Certainly.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman be good enough to inform the committee whether or not the enlisted strength of the corps has been reduced?

Mr. AYRES. We provide for the Budget number.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. But does not the gentleman necessitate a reduction by reducing the amount of money?

Mr. AYRES. No; I do not agree to that.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman's committee in its report states that there is no reduction in the Marine Corps, there being approximately 15,343 men; but when you reduce the appropriation that supports that organization by the amount suggested, do you not fail to make provisions for some 500 or 600 men? Is not that correct?

Mr. AYRES. I believe there will be enough slack in the appropriation for pay of the Marine Corps to maintain the present enlisted strength.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. But is not my statement correct that while you have not reduced the strength of the Marine Corps you reduce the money necessary to maintain it, and what the committee has done is indirectly to reduce the Marine Corps by about 500 or 600 men?

Mr. AYRES. As I said before, I think within the total sum proposed for pay of the Marine Corps, which is all one fund, sufficient funds will be found to avoid a reduction in enlisted strength.

Mr. COYLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I have reserved a point of order. I will yield to the gentleman, however.

Mr. COYLE. Does the gentleman raise the point of order now?

Mr. GOSS. Yes; I will raise it now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. GOSS. That the proviso in lines 8 to 10 is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. COYLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. COYLE. The substitute to the committee amendment, which I have introduced, provides for the striking out of those two lines among other things. Unless the gentleman wishes to argue the point of order, I am willing to go to a vote on the amendment.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. I do not think there is any question, or that there should be any question, but that the language—

Provided, That no person shall be commissioned as an officer in the Marine Corps prior to June 1, 1933—is subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. What page is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. BRITTEN. I am reading from page 44, lines 9 and 10.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COYLE] reserve a point of order?

Mr. COYLE. I am not making the point of order, but the gentleman from Connecticut is.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. AYRES. No; I think not. All I can say is that it is in order under the Holman rule. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman from Kansas point out under what portion of the Holman rule it comes?

Mr. AYRES. No; I can not.

Mr. BRITTEN. Neither can anybody else.

Mr. BYRNS. It simply reduces expenses.

Mr. TABER. It reduces the number of persons that can be placed upon the Government pay roll.

Mr. BRITTEN. What number does it reduce?

Mr. TABER. It prevents them from being put on.

Mr. BRITTEN. No; it does not prevent that at all.

Mr. Chairman, it has been suggested that this comes within the Holman rule. It has also been suggested that it reduces the number of men in the corps. It has also been suggested that it reduces the appropriations. It does not do any of those things. The language is very clear.

It says:

Provided, That no person shall be commissioned as an officer in the Marine Corps prior to June 1, 1933.

That no person shall be commissioned prior to June 1, 1933. That is certainly subject to a point of order. It is brand-new legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. BYRNS. The very language as read by the gentleman shows that it will result in a saving of money to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BRITTEN. How much money?

Mr. BYRNS. Because it is perfectly clear that if even one man is commissioned between now and the date named, it will involve an additional charge upon the Treasury of the United States, and it does not matter whether it is one or a dozen; if it saves one copper cent to the Treasury, it comes within the Holman rule.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, in connection with this matter, it is very uncertain, and, further, the law provides a specific number of officers to be on the list, and no one can be added to it without retiring some one whose place is to be taken. Therefore I can not see where there would be any actual saving.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. Does the gentleman anticipate there will be some officer commissioned, if this language is carried, between now and the date named?

Mr. GOSS. You can not tell.

Mr. BYRNS. But does the gentleman believe it is possible for some officer to be commissioned between now and the date named?

Mr. GOSS. Only if some one is retired or resigned.

Mr. BYRNS. Absolutely, and when that is done, Mr. Chairman, you have increased the charge upon the Treasury of the United States to that extent.

Mr. GOSS. How?

Mr. BYRNS. By granting him a commission. That means an additional officer in the service whose salary will have to be paid.

Mr. GOSS. He is not an additional officer.

Mr. TABER. If the gentleman will permit, in the Marine Corps we are at the present time 60 short of the number of officers that the law permits. Therefore it is very natural and reasonable to expect that unless this provision is in the bill the number of officers will be increased prior to June 1, 1933.

Mr. GOSS. That is not at all reasonable.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FULLER). The Chair is ready to rule. The Chair concedes this is a very close question, but in view of the Holman rule, and considering the circumstances and the policy being pursued to reduce expenditures, the Chair believes the Holman rule would apply. The Chair is supported in his opinion by a decision made by Chairman Towner on April 18, 1922, which may be found in Cannon's Precedents, section 8581. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does the Chair desire to have the committee understand that if the present depression did not prevail, this language in the bill would be subject to a point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overruled the point of order.

Mr. COYLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my substitute be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COYLE as a substitute for the committee amendment:

On page 44, beginning in line 5, strike out "$3,602,277" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,766,211."

In line 6, strike out "$493,116" and insert in lieu thereof "$516,731"; strike out "$648,063" and insert in lieu thereof "$678,319"; and strike out "$4,743,456" and insert in lieu thereof "$4,961,261."

Strike out the proviso beginning with line 8 and ending in line 10.

The CHAIRMAN. The Parliamentarian calls the Chair's attention to the fact that this is not a substitute because it contains a great deal of matter that is too broad to be a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas. The gentleman has too much in his substitute.

Mr. COYLE. It is all one subject matter and in one paragraph. It relates to the paragraph affected by the committee amendment. The thing I do not desire to do is to lose my parliamentary rights.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that he can offer his amendment later, but the gentleman's amendment is not proper as a substitute amendment for the committee amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, may we have the committee amendment again read?

The Clerk again reported the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COYLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COYLE: Page 45, line 5, strike out "$3,602,277" and insert in lieu thereof "$3,766,211"; in line 6, strike out "$493,116" and insert in lieu thereof "$516,731"; strike out "$648,063" and insert in lieu thereof "$678,319"; strike out "$4,743,456" and insert in lieu thereof "$4,961,261"; and strike out the proviso in lines 8, 9, and 10.

Mr. COYLE. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, if adopted, will put $217,000, in round figures, back into this paragraph "Pay, Marine Corps."

The bill at the present time provides, theoretically, for a certain maximum number of officers and men in the Marine Corps but does not provide the money necessary to pay the number of men which the bill states, or the hearings state, will be provided for under the bill as reported. As a consequence, since it is not possible to shoot existing officers, since it is not possible to put them on the shelf, the entire reduction in this item plus an item on the next page of $100,000 for the enlisted force is bound to come out of the enlisted pay of the Marine Corps, which means that the total number of marines will be reduced at least 600 below the number stated in the bill.

This bill does appropriate, not for 17,400—the original enlisted strength of 1931—but, theoretically, for 2,057 less than 17,400. It also reduces the present number of commissioned officers by 53 by not providing sufficient funds to pay them.

In order to take 53 officers off of the active list of the Marine Corps it is necessary to expend them in some way or other; and since the law provides that pay of enlisted men and pay of officers be administered as one fund, the only way in which they can possibly cut their cloth to make it go around is by cutting off entirely on enlistments. They can not cut off on reenlistments because that is a part of a man's right.

This leaves the Marine Corps underofficered and undermanned. I very sincerely hope that the Committee of the Whole House will go along with me on this increase of $217,000, and one which I shall introduce subsequently on the next page calling for $100,000 for the enlisted men.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COYLE. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman state why the Marine Corps is underofficered? In the first place, I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the authorized number of officers of the Marine Corps is 1,096, based upon an authorized enlisted strength of 27,400. The enlisted strength, as a matter of fact, has been under 20,000 for a number of years, and the Budget figure was upon the basis of 15,340 men, which is what we have for 1932. The committee is committed to the idea that a reasonable surplus of officers is justifiable but questions the wisdom of further expanding the officer strength of the Marine Corps in the face of the reduction, actual and prospective, in the enlisted strength of that organization. The bill is drawn for the sole purpose of preventing any expansion prior to June, 1933, and the funds proposed are based upon an average of 977 commissioned officers, instead of 1,030.

Mr. COYLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent at this time for five additional minutes in order to answer the gentleman from Kansas.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. COYLE. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Kansas, my thought about the Marine Corps being underofficered and undermanned is pretty well demonstrated by a little news item in the paper this morning. I think perhaps most of you got it. It is typical of the Marine Corps. In the jungles in Nicaragua one young marine officer, a noncommissioned officer, and a warrant officer of the Navy lost their lives in the protection of American rights and American property, and lost their lives because they were ordered there by the United States Government.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COYLE. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. I suppose the gentleman knows that it is the plan of the department completely to withdraw from Nicaragua by the 1st of next January. It does not seem to me that Nicaragua should be brought into this matter.

Mr. COYLE. The gentleman did not get my point. The number of officers in proportion to the number of men needed abroad on active service is very much larger than is necessary in barracks in the United States.

Mr. AYRES. We have practically the same officer personnel for a Marine Corps of 15,333 enlisted men as we had when there were 27,000.

Mr. COYLE. That is perfectly true; and if we were to provide in this bill only for no increase until 1933, I could go along with him. But the trouble is that this bill requires a reduction in the personnel of the Marine Corps by about 53 officers and 600 men, because there is not money enough to provide the pay for the present number and you are providing a money limitation against any increase. The service that this corps performs is vital to America. Once before, under some pressure, we took the marines out of Nicaragua, and it cost nearly $20,000,000 to make up for that mistake.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COYLE. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Does the gentleman think there is any common sense in taking the marines out of Nicaragua?

Mr. COYLE. The gentleman knows the necessity for having trained officers there.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Yes; I have been down there, and we saw the disaster that occurred by bringing them out of Nicaragua before.

Mr. COYLE. It cost us a lot of money and immeasurable loss of lives.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. And it will cost us immeasurable loss again if we take them out of there, for they will have to go back again in a few months.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me to ask a question of the gentleman from Oregon?

Mr. COYLE. I will.

Mr. KELLER. Does the gentleman from Oregon think these extra officers are necessary?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I do.

Mr. KELLER. Then I am for it.

Mr. FISH. Can the gentleman from Pennsylvania give us any information how long we are to keep the marines in Nicaragua?

Mr. COYLE. I am sorry, but I can not.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate very much the efforts of the subcommittee to reduce these appropriations. But, in a study of the report, as issued by the committee, I am convinced the committee has made a statistical error.

I want, first, to call attention to what is said in the report on page 25. It says:

> Pay and allowances of 53 fewer commissioned officers on the active list, $217,805.

Now, I gather from that statement the committee contemplates reducing the number of officers in the Marine Corps next year to the extent of 53. I conclude, further, that there is no way of reducing the number of men and officers except by failing to appoint additional ones. There is no way whereby you can retire the men by operation of law in this bill. The only way a reduction can follow, the only way you can get a fewer number of officers in the Marine Corps next year, is by refusal or failure to appoint additional ones.

Mr. AYRES. The gentleman overlooks attrition. Assuming that the attrition will be about the same next year as it was in the fiscal year 1931, vacancies will occur to the number possibly of 46, and we provide that such vacancies shall not be filled.

Mr. HARE. Thereby there will be a reduction in the total number. The only persons that could be appointed would be appointed at the lowest salaries. They will be appointed as lieutenants. Their salary is $1,500. The committee acted upon the assumption that a reduction of $217,805 would be at the average rate of pay for officers in the Marine Corps, which is approximately $4,109.53. If the committee is going to reduce the appropriation equivalent to the reduction that would follow from the failure to appoint 53 additional officers, and there is no objection to that provision, it should have taken into consideration the fact that the lowest salary should be applied to the 53 men and not the average salary of all officers.

If every one of these appointments were to be filled, what would it take? Not $217,805 but 53 multiplied by 1,500, which would be $79,500. If the committee had been statistically correct in its operations, in place of $217,805 it would have said $79,500, leaving in the balance of $138,305.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. In case there should be a vacancy, for instance, in the higher grades, will the vacancy be automatically filled by promotion from a lower grade or will the place be left vacant as it may occur, whether in the higher or the lower grades?

Mr. HARE. My impression is, from the report of the chairman of the committee, that there would be no change. If I should retire, for instance, as an officer, at a salary of $5,000, the appropriation would be reduced to that extent, because it is included here and there would be no chance for promotion.

Mr. TILSON. If the vacancies occur among the higher officers and the places are not filled by promotion, then I presume the statistics of the committee may be correct; but if the grades are to be immediately filled by automatic promotion, then the gentleman from South Carolina is correct in making his figures based on the lowest grade only.

Mr. HARE. The committee takes into consideration the average salary for all officers and assumes all vacancies will appear on July 1, 1932, whereas these 53 men who are going to die or retire will not all retire the 1st of July. Some of them will be in August, some in September, some in November, some in December, some in February, and March, and June, but the committee has gone ahead and reduced the appropriation as if they were all to be retired the 1st of July. The point I am making is that if no officers are appointed in the Marine Corps, and this purported reduction is made in the total appropriation, the Marine Corps will of necessity be compelled to reduce its number of enlisted men to offset the $138,000, and there is no way around it. If the committee does not want to reduce the number of enlisted men of the Marine Corps, I think it should agree to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania or else amend the amendment so as to make the difference, $138,305.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. FIESINGER. As I understand it, there has been provision for all of the graduates at Annapolis this year in the Navy.

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. FIESINGER. Some of those graduates desire to go into the Marine Corps.

Mr. HARE. Yes.

Mr. FIESINGER. If we do not adopt this amendment, then those boys who want to go into the Marine Corps can not get into it, but must go into the Navy.

Mr. HARE. Yes; and you simply shift the appropriation from the Marine Corps to the Navy Department, and there will be no saving in that.

Mr. AYRES. The gentleman is in error about that. As the bill is drawn, no appointments may be made to the Navy either in excess of possibly 26.

Mr. HARE. But you provided in another bill that went to conference this morning that all graduates from the Naval Academy in June will be commissioned, but you simply say here that they shall not be appointed in the Marine Corps.

Mr. AYRES. That is true; and we did so deliberately.

Mr. HARE. And these men who are to be graduated from the Naval Academy in June will all have to go into the Navy Department and will all have to draw their pay from this appropriation; and instead of reducing the appropriation as you would have us believe, you are simply eliminating from the Marine Corps and reinstating it in the Navy. Simply taking it out of one pocket and putting it in another. Consequently, there will be no real reduction in the final appropriation, but an added reduction in the number of enlisted men in the Marine Corps, with an increased number of officers in the Navy after July 1, or just as soon as the 400 young men graduate from the Naval Academy.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN] may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Chairman, with the present disturbed conditions on the American Continent, I believe this is no time to cheesepare on the Marine Corps, because I think that serious business is ahead of them during the year 1933, in view of the present unsettled conditions in Central America. In August, 1926, a great patriot from Nicaragua came down to Panama on a transport which brought out those hundred marines who had brought great peace and prosperity to that country for 14 years. This great patriot said:

> This is the happiest day of my life. Now the foreigner is off our soil. Now Nicaragua is free. Watch us grow. Watch us prosper. Now I have control of my fortune.

My friend went back to Nicaragua. A year later he was in Panama, stripped of everything he had, and he was fortunate to escape with his life. He said—

> My God, we must have the marines back there, because our people are killing each other off. Unless we get American protection I do not know what is going to happen to my country.

I do not care what is said about drawing the marines out of Nicaragua, when we see conditions which prevail there to-day, civilization demands of us that we keep the marines down there. The same thing is true of Haiti. I have been in Haiti and I know the conditions there. It is unthinkable what would happen to that country in the present unsettled and distressed condition of the world if the marines were taken out of Haiti. It will not be done and, therefore, if this work for the marines in Nicaragua and Haiti is necessary, we must make liberal appropriations for them and keep up their present high state of morale.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I yield.

Mr. FISH. I have been in sympathy with sending the marines to Nicaragua in the past. They were not there to exploit Nicaragua, but to preserve law and order, generally at the request of the Government.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Yes; to save Nicaragua.

Mr. FISH. About how long will it be necessary to keep the marines there? Are they to be there indefinitely?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. No.

Mr. FISH. Can the gentleman give us some information on that point?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. They certainly should be kept there as long as the present disturbed conditions prevail. The gentleman must realize that all of the Latin American countries—all of South America now is in a most deplorable state.

Mr. FISH. Does the gentleman want us to police all of South America and Central America?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. No; but we do not want to pull out at this time.

Mr. COYLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I yield.

Mr. COYLE. The gentleman would agree with my idea that if we take most of the marines out we should take them all out? Our danger has been in leaving a few unprotected in hostile countries?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Yes. At this time I would not disturb them at all.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I yield.

Mr. AYRES. I should like to remind the gentleman that the question before the committee is not a question of enlisted personnel. It is a question of officers.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Well, we must have officers if we have the men.

Mr. AYRES. We provide—and I think adequately—for all of the enlisted personnel that is being asked for—that is, some 15,500 men. Now, as to the reduction of officers, when the enlisted strength was 27,000 marines we did not have more than 1,096 officers, as I remember. The enlisted strength has now been reduced from 27,000—not by this committee—down to a little over 15,000 men, and yet they are asking for substantially the same officer personnel. We now have at this time practically the same number of officers as we had when the enlisted strength of the corps was 27,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. AYRES. Now, I will say to the gentleman from Oregon, attrition among these officers should take out at least 46 officers during the next fiscal year. That was the number in 1931; so we are simply reducing the appropriation in anticipation of a similar ratio of attrition and are providing for 977 officers to officer a force of a little over 15,000 men, whereas the legal maximum number is 1,096 on the basis of 27,400 marines. The question of details in Haiti and Nicaragua is not involved here. It is a question as to whether or not we are going to maintain the same officer personnel in a more nearly reasonable proportion to the enlisted strength.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I will not have time to go into the refinements of the gentleman's argument; but the amendment offered by the gentleman calls for the amount recommended by the Budget, which the committee has cut down; and I do not think that should be done. That Budget was cut to the bone with reference to the marines to preserve them in their present state of efficiency. With the work ahead of them, I would not disturb that one penny.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman referred to the marines in Haiti. Are they not practically all out of there?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. There are marines in China, in Haiti, and Nicaragua.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But we have no considerable force in Haiti, have we?

Mr. AYRES. I have forgotten the exact number; about 800, I should say.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. I will say to the gentleman that if they are all out, they will be back.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think we ought to confuse this proposition with the question of whether or not the marines should be kept in Nicaragua or whether they are needed in Haiti or in any other country in South America or in any of the islands. This is plainly a proposition of whether or not we are going to add, in the last analysis, the sum of $318,000 to this bill, and make an additional charge upon the Treasury at this time. That is all there is to it.

As the gentleman from Kansas has told you, the proposal of this amendment is to allow the same number of officers for the Marine Corps consisting to-day of something like 15,000 men that there were when its enlisted strength was 27,000 men.

Gentlemen, next week some of you are going to vote to cut the salary of every employee of this Government receiving over $1,000 a year; and in view of that fact and the effort to cut expenses in other directions, I appeal to you that we should not vote it upon the people of the United States merely because some one proposes an amendment carrying $318,000.

I want to tell you, gentlemen, and I say it from the bottom of my heart, if something is not done to reduce the expenditures of the Federal Government, of State governments, of municipal governments, I am very apprehensive of what may happen. We have just passed a tax bill which is now under consideration in the Senate, in which we are loading additional burdens upon the people of this country. You are now asked to vote $318,000 additional upon this bill. You voted an additional $1,000,000 upon this bill yesterday for a hospital that is not needed.

The marines are not going to be hurt. Let me say to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MARTIN] that were a million dollars voted upon this bill, it would not keep the marines in Nicaragua, because we have here the statement of Admiral Pratt in which he states that the marines will be withdrawn after their next election. Why vote this money when there is no necessity of maintaining marines in Central America, and when the taxpayers of this country are suffering?

I plead with you in the name, and in the interest, of the people of this country not to adopt an amendment to provide additional officers when you are cutting down everybody else, and when we are told that the action of the body at the other end of the Capitol, if it is persevered in, is going to mean the elimination from the Federal pay roll of thousands of civilian employees. Yet it is proposed by this amendment to place additional officers in the Marine Corps!

Gentlemen, I am opposed to it. I am opposed to it in the first place because the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee after the fullest investigation decided that it is not necessary. I am opposed to it in the second place because I do not wish to place additional charges upon the people of this country. If you are going to reduce, then in the name of high Heaven reduce! [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee, the chairman of the committee, ought to receive the hearty accord of every Member of the House. [Applause.] The attitude of the subcommittee was not the attitude merely of the majority members or the Democratic members, it was the attitude of the entire subcommittee, and the attitude that we recommended to the full committee, and the position that was approved by the full Committee on Appropriations.

The gentleman is quite right when he again calls the attention of the House to the importance of reducing the Budget. If every time an item is reached wherein some Member of the House feels that some friend is involved, or some institution is involved that he admires more than any other, we are not going to reduce the Budget at all, because we are all pulled and torn by personal admiration toward individuals and toward groups, and no gentleman has higher regard for the Marine Corps than I. I realize and applaud the fine service of this institution, but that is not the problem here. The problem here is whether or not we have carried enough money to care for the number of officers that we are planning to have next year. We have not reduced, or taken steps to reduce, in proportion, the number of officers to the number of enlisted men who will be withdrawn during the next year under estimates from the Budget. This number is 53. The reductions to which we have had reference to-day are the reductions based upon the normal way of figuring money reductions from the standpoint of allowances for subsistence, pay, and rent computed upon the number of officers.

Again, it must be remembered that the entire amount we are carrying in this bill for the Marine Corps will be handled as one lump sum, and if it should be deficient as to one particular factor there are many other factors that make up the sum total and needed money can be found within that sum total to meet the situation. Therefore, I urge the Members of the House to sustain the recommendation of the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. MAAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. I yield.

Mr. MAAS. It is proposed to reduce by 53 officers. How are you going to reduce those officers? There is no basis in law for discharging those officers.

Mr. FRENCH. There will be normal attrition, and I should say to the gentleman that the estimate that we made was based upon normal attrition which will, we believe, take care of this situation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SCHAFER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas that debate on this section, and all amendments thereto, close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I may not use my entire five minutes. We have just listened to eloquent speeches in the name of economy delivered on the floor of the House by two distinguished colleagues, one a Republican member and one a Democratic member of the Committee on Appropriations.

When they talked about the Budget tears rolled down their faces and rolled down the faces of other Members who heard their eloquent pleas in favor of reducing the appropriations for the Navy Department and balancing the Budget. But, my friends, they are not always consistent. They are not always looking out for the interest of the taxpayers and the Budget which is so dear to their hearts to-day. It is not always their holy of holies. I recollect that they were not here pleading for the taxpayers and the Budget when one of the appropriation bills was pending in the House and several of us attempted to help balance that Budget by paring a measly $1,000,000 from the appropriation for the enforcement of the unenforceable prohibition law. Where was the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] and where was the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], who made these eloquent pleas to-day, when that attempt was made? They were on the opposite side of the fence, aligned with those Members of the House who bitterly condemned us as being un-American for having the temerity to offer and support an amendment to reduce the Prohibition Bureau appropriation. Now, my friends, if you are really interested in the taxpayers and balancing the Budget, particularly my friend from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH] and my friend from Tennessee, the chairman of the great Appropriations Committee [Mr. BYRNS], I ask you to step up to the Clerk's desk and sign the petition to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the 2.75 per cent beer bill, which will bring about $500,000,000 into the Federal Treasury each year. These gentlemen should stop making these demagogic pleas in the name of economy and get down to bedrock and practice some real economy and render some real service to the taxpayers' Treasury.

The testimony before the Ways and Means Committee on the tax bill, page 26, indicates that the Secretary of the Treasury testified that in 1919 we had an income to our Federal Treasury of $483,000,000 by reason of excise taxes on beverages containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol. That stupendous figure does not even take into consideration the great amount, running into the millions of dollars, in income taxes paid by reason of the legal manufacture of these beverages.

To-day in these days of prohibition prosperity we do not have this stupendous annual revenue but, on the other hand, are spending $40,043,313.50 annually from the badly battered Federal taxpayers' Treasury to enforce the unenforceable prohibition law. This is the actual cost of prohibition enforcement by the Prohibition Department, Bureau of Industrial Alcohol, and the Coast Guard. I ask that you stop talking about economy—which you do not practice—and sign the petition on the beer bill, which if enacted will bring about $500,000,000 into the Federal Treasury each year and also result in a reduction in the cost of beer to the consumers. Of course, the enactment of this bill will also reduce the incomes of bootleggers, rum runners, and racketeers.

If you really believe in economy and have a sincere desire to serve the taxpayers, sign the petition and practice it; but if you are not sincere, then for goodness sake do not try to fool the American people by making them believe you are for economy and for relieving the American people of burdensome taxes when you really are not.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. How many gallons of this beer would we have to consume to raise $500,000,000?

Mr. SCHAFER. We would not have to consume many more gallons than will be consumed under the wort and malt tax provision in the revenue bill, which was merged in the amendment with the oil-tariff tax for Oklahoma. If you are going to tax wort, which is prohibited by the Volstead Act, that means that you are going to approve the use of wort in the manufacture of 9 per cent beer, which is made by the racketeers and sold to the public at outrageous prices. If we are going to get the revenue from that source in the amount claimed by the Ways and Means Committee, we will have to tax 8,000,000,000 pints of wort beer. I think that will answer the gentleman's question. [Applause.]

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman proceeds, will he yield to me for a question? I am wondering if the gentleman will yield me two minutes of his time so that I may talk on the amendment, or does the gentleman contemplate using the five minutes that are left?

Mr. AYRES. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PARKS] is a member of the committee, and I suggest the gentleman be permitted to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Chairman, at the time I made my pro forma motion it had slipped my mind that debate had been limited. I am willing to yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN].

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. BYRNS], I think, rather confused the House when he suggested that the amendment now pending intended to add additional officers to the Marine Corps as well as additional men. The amendment does not do anything of the sort.

The gentleman also said that we had added $1,000,000 to this bill on yesterday, which would come out of the Treasury of the United States. We have done nothing of the sort. We added $1,000,000 for a hospital, which amount will come out of a special fund called the hospital fund of the Navy.

Mr. BYRNS. It comes out of the Treasury.

Mr. BRITTEN. It comes out of the Treasury, but the money is in a special fund and can not be used for any other purpose.

Mr. BYRNS. But the money comes out of the Treasury; and may I ask the gentleman if this amendment does not specifically undertake to cut out the language prohibiting the appointment of commissioned officers? So I was absolutely correct.

Mr. BRITTEN. I will answer the gentleman very frankly. In 1931–32, the present fiscal year, there were 17,400 enlisted men in the Marine Corps. The Bureau of the Budget and the Secretary of the Navy and the Major General Commandant of the Marine Corps, all trying to practice economy, as suggested by the chairman of the committee itself, reduced their appropriation so as to provide for 15,343 men in the Marine Corps. This is what they desired. This is what the Navy desired. This is what the Navy expected Congress to appropriate for.

Mr. BYRNS. If the gentleman will allow me to correct him now, because I know the gentleman wants to be accurate, the gentleman made the remark a while ago that the $1,000,000 added to the bill comes out of the hospital fund. I am reminded that the provision with respect to the hospital fund was stricken out on a point of order and that the money comes directly out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BRITTEN. I apologize to the gentleman. Evidently I was not in the room when that language was stricken from the amendment that was adopted. I believe that was done on a point of order made by a member of the committee. The money could have come from the hospital fund, but I agree it was subject to a point of order.

As I said a moment ago, the Marine Corps and the Navy Department expected Congress to appropriate for the minimum of men and officers required to successfully and properly run the corps. This minimum number was 15,343.

The chairman of this distinguished subcommittee said to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McCLINTIC] a little while ago that he was arbitrarily attempting to slice $69,000 from an appropriation with no apparent grounds for it. This same committee, gentlemen, has arbitrarily sliced $100,000 from the estimates sent up here by the Director of the Budget so that while the number does not appear any different on its face, the 15,343 men required by the Marine Corps will be reduced by 600 men through an arbitrary slice in the appropriation of $100,000. The provision goes farther than that and provides not for economy, but provides for waste, and I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COYLE] will prevail.

Mr. Chairman, the Marine Corps had an enlisted strength of 17,400 men in 1931, which was appropriated for in the fiscal year of 1932. The Bureau of the Budget reduced the funds in its estimates for 1933 to an amount sufficient for 15,343 enlisted—a reduction of 2,057. The present bill, by reducing the number of officers by 53, and an arbitrary cut of $100,000 in "Pay, enlisted," will require a further reduction of 600 enlisted, although the bill states that appropriation is being made for 15,343.

The bill does not point out how a reduction of 53 officers is to be made, but it appears that an erroneous assumption has been made that by preventing any officers being commissioned during the fiscal year 1933, the attrition during the year will take care of this reduction in strength. However, this is not the case. In order to arrive at the amounts shown in the bill, it will be necessary for this reduction to be made immediately at the beginning of the fiscal year, and whereas the saving will be on the pay of second lieutenants who are not appointed to fill vacancies, the deductions have been made on higher rates of pay. It is obvious then that the deficiency created in the pay of officers will have to be made by a reduction in the enlisted ranks.

The restriction imposed by lines 9 and 10, page 44, preventing the commissioning of any officers in the Marine Corps in the fiscal year 1933 will cause irremediable damage, as it will prevent the normal flow of young officers into the corps, such as the 30 graduates from the Naval Academy, which it was planned to commission, and a small class of meritorious noncommissioned officers, who it is expected to promote from the ranks.

The cost of the 30 graduates from the Naval Academy is not additional cost to the Government, as these officers will be commissioned as ensigns in the Navy with the remainder of the graduates of the class of 1932, and will be in excess of the number of ensigns which the Navy expected to receive from this source. The small number of meritorious noncommissioned officers have earned the right to promotion and it is one of the rewards which is held out to young men in the ranks, which has been a great factor to morale. To close the door to these young men would be a great blow to the enlisted personnel and would militate against the spirit which actuates the enlisted personnel.

Mr. Chairman, the Marine Corps performs various and arduous duties, such as guarding naval stations, furnishing detachments for duty on vessels of the Navy, and expeditionary forces in Haiti, Nicaragua, and China, and being ready at all times to meet such emergency calls as may arise for the protection of lives and property of American citizens in disturbed countries.

The strength of 17,400 was barely adequate to perform these duties. The reduction which has already taken place has been keenly felt, and the efficiency of the Marine Corps has been correspondingly reduced. It is now below the limit of safety. A prospective reduction of 600 more enlisted personnel, which is inevitable if this bill is enacted in its present form, will be a blow to the efficiency of the corps, and it will be unable to carry out the present demands that are made on it, and will, moreover, be unable to meet any emergencies which may occur in the future. To correct this condition the following amendment is proposed.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COYLE].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. COYLE) there were—ayes 34, noes 100.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. AYRES: Page 44, lines 10, 11, and 12, strike out the following: "Provided further, That hereafter additional pay for making aerial flights shall in no case be at a rate in excess of $1,100 per annum."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay and allowances of the Marine Corps Reserve (a) excluding transferred and assigned men, $237,620; (b) transferred men, $281,696; (c) assigned men, $65,750; in all, $585,066: Provided, That hereafter no enlisted man of the Marine Corps shall be assigned to the Fleet Marine Corps Reserve as provided for in section 22 of the act of February 23, 1925 (U. S. C., title 34, sec. 783).

Mr. COYLE. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the Clerk's desk to the paragraph at the top of page 45 that has been cut out of a previous amendment and marked as a separate amendment to lines 7 and 8. I ask unanimous consent, in view of the vote on the last amendment, to go back to lines 7 and 8.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. AYRES. I would like to accommodate the gentleman, but under the circumstances I can not do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, $15,151,089, and the money herein specifically appropriated for pay of the Marine Corps shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law and shall constitute one fund.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 46, line 2, after the word "constitute," strike out the words "one fund" and insert "separate funds for the regular reserve division of the marine service as appropriated herein."

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered for the purpose of preserving the Marine Reserves. It has been stated on the floor that the reduction in the number of officers can not be made; that is, it has been made clear that it can not be made unless a law is passed removing from the corps officers besides those removed by usual attrition.

It has been stated that the money could be gotten only from the enlisted men's pay. That is not true; it could be taken from the allowances for the Reserve Corps.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Is the gentleman aware that this appropriation has been carried in this way for the last 10 years?

Mr. WHITE. I am.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. There has been no abuse of it?

Mr. WHITE. I do not know whether there has been an abuse of it or not. I hope the gentleman is correct.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. These are matters that must be left to the administrative head.

Mr. WHITE. If I was assured that there would be no abuse of it I would not press the amendment.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. This appropriation has been carried in this language for the last 10 years, and this method is very helpful in the economical administration of the fund.

Mr. WHITE. I would like to call attention to what happened here yesterday when the Naval Reserve was voted out. A man on the Great Lakes, Capt. Anthony Nicklett, who served from 1899 to 1917 without pay, was shorn of his position without consideration. There was no good reason for it. He brought 343 officers and men into the service in 1917, including an air unit. That man is still at work. I do not want the same thing to happen to the Marine Reserves. That is the reason for offering this amendment. If the fund is not to be absorbed for other purposes, I see no reason for not putting the provision in the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The President, the Congress, the press, and the legitimate banking institutions of the United States are all in a fine spirit of patriotism free from partisanship or other prejudice, doing everything in their power to restore confidence and faith in this country. We can not succeed in our present difficulties except that in the minds and hearts of the American people there is confidence and faith in our common country and its institutions. Yet in the face of this fine cooperation on the part of patriotic leadership in this country, we find a class of people who are doing everything within their power to wreck the confidence and faith of the American people in America, and are endeavoring to capitalize upon the distress of the people. This class of people, who are at this moment practicing little less than treason to this country, are composed of a band of conspirators of some citizens of this country and of foreign countries.

Unfortunately, the people of America have become so stock-market minded that they look too greatly to the stock market for the information as to the condition of the United States rather than to legitimate business. These American and foreign conspirators are taking advantage of this situation, doing everything they can to destroy security values and thereby to destroy public confidence. They are endeavoring to reap their profits which are to be measured by the extent they can destroy the faith and confidence of the people of this country.

The hearings now going on before the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate disclose clearly that certain American citizens in league with certain foreign institutions are carrying on a concerted and organized effort to destroy the security values of American institutions and thereby further impoverish the American people, who have their life earnings invested in American institutions.

There can be no question but that the conduct of these people is shameful, dishonorable, and disloyal. The hearings before this committee have disclosed that American brokerage houses are carrying upon their books customers under assumed names who are selling short American institutions. One brokerage house in selling short for a customer under the assumed name of Sadie Silk, another under the assumed name of Stella Stitch, another under the assumed name of Watt & Watt, another under the assumed names of Mr., Mrs., or Miss G. Oka, another under the assumed name of Lilly Schiff, and another under the assumed name of Rose Sheer. There are literally scores of these fictitious names who are selling short the securities of the United States. Any brokerage house which would permit a customer to operate under an assumed name and any customer who sells under an assumed name is obviously carrying on a program which is shameful, dishonest, and disloyal. The people who are operating under these assumed names and thereby endeavoring to destroy the confidence of the people of this country are confessedly doing a shameful thing and are endeavoring to hide their identity as highwaymen try to hide their identity with masks.

Not only are American citizens engaged in this program which is so shameful that they seek to disguise their identity but foreign interests are likewise engaged in this raid against American securities. The hearings before the Senate committee disclose that the Travellers Bank of Paris and the Bank of France are either lending the name of their institutions or are directly engaged in this conspiracy to destroy American values. Three different banks of Holland were uncovered as being in this raid against American finance. One of these Holland banks is the government institution which corresponds to the Federal reserve in the United States.

Aside from this shameful effort to destroy American values, the Senate committee has uncovered something else which is nothing less than disloyalty to country and treachery to the American people. This committee has brought to light that in June, 1930, J. P. Morgan & Co. bought $9,200,000 of German reparation bonds on the stock market. Mr. Whitney, president of the stock exchange, and a member of the brokerage firm which bought these bonds for the Morgan Co., testified that the buying of these bonds by the Morgan Co. contributed to the sustaining of the market of that issue of German bonds at $90 per unit, while international bankers were palming $98,000,000 worth of these German bonds on to the American people at this sustained and fictitious price of $90. Mr. Whitney was compelled to admit and testify that after $98,000,000 worth of these bonds had been sold to the American people at the rate of $90 a unit and after this Morgan syndicate stopped buying these bonds on the market, these bonds went down to as low as $23 and are now selling for $35.50. Here we find an American citizen buying $9,200,000 worth of bonds on the open market and keeping up a fictitious value on them in order that American citizens could be tricked into buying $98,000,000 worth of them. Here was an American institution deceiving the citizens of the United States in order to milk them of their money to be given over to a foreign country. It is always reprehensible for one to deceive and rob his neighbor, but when it is done on a commission basis for the benefit of foreign countries, this is reprehensible and low beyond belief.

International bankers in conspiracy and in league with foreign interests have floated billions of dollars of these bonds upon the American people. How many were floated in the manner here described no one knows. As these private bonds were floated, foreign government bonds due to the United States Government became less valuable. Now we find that the people who were tricked into buying these bonds are the victims and the Government of the United States has likewise been victimized.

When the moratorium was under consideration these international bankers testified without an exception that they no longer owned the foreign bonds, but that they were out in the hands of the American people. They admitted that they took their commissions and that it was a closed incident so far as they were concerned.

In the hearings before the Coinage, Weights, and Measures Committee of the House, of which I am a member, we have found that foreign countries indebted to the United States have willfully and deliberately debased and debauched their silver money. In doing this they accomplished what was inevitable from the experience of the centuries, and that is with the destroying of the value of silver commodity prices are likewise destroyed.

From the hearings before this committee, I am firm in the conviction and I believe every member of the committee is firm in the conviction that these foreign countries debauched their silver with the designed purpose of completely destroying the American manufacturing industry and American agriculture for the purpose of forcing the United States to cancel the war debts which are justly due this Nation from these foreign countries. I am firm in the conviction that it has been their designed purpose to force the people of the United States to pay for a war which they never started.

Foreign countries that owe this Nation, with their budgets balanced, are making up their budgets for the coming year totally ignoring their debts to this country. The time has come for the Congress and the people of this country to realize that Europe is waging an economic war upon the United States and that there are traitors within our own citizenship, in the form of international bankers and speculators, who are destroying security values with the designed purpose of forcing this country to cancel the war debts and to heap upon the shoulders of the American people the expenses of a war in which they had no interest except to serve the true interests of humanity and to save some of the nations that are to-day carrying on this conspiracy against this country. Realizing these facts, I believe that it is time for the Congress and the people of the United States to serve notice on Europe that we expect these countries owing the United States these debts to pay their interest this year.

I am ready for a joint resolution by the House and the Senate declaring that we will not cancel the war debt, that we will not consent to an extension of the interest this year and call upon these countries to pay us the interest which they owe us for the coming year. Further realizing these facts, I think it is time for the Congress of the United States and the people of the United States to take the stock exchange and the international bankers in hand and just as nearly as possible accord to them the same consideration that is always accorded to one who is a traitor to his country. So far as I am concerned, let it be said that any institution or any American citizen, who practices the program of that which the J. P. Morgan & Co. practiced in selling these bonds to the American people, stands in the same light before the American people of this and future generations as does any common traitor to the American people.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Quartermaster, $126,560; in all, $305,030: Provided, That the total number of enlisted men on duty at Marine Corps headquarters on May 7, 1930, shall not be increased, and in lieu of enlisted men whose services at such headquarters shall be terminated for any cause prior to July 1, 1933, their places may be filled by civilians, for the pay of whom, in accordance with the classification act of 1923, as amended, either or both the appropriations "Pay, Marine Corps," and "General expenses, Marine Corps," shall be available: Provided further, That neither this nor any other Marine Corps appropriation shall be available for the employment in a civil capacity of any transferred member of the Marine Corps Reserve at a rate of compensation which, in conjunction with his reserve pay, would exceed the sum of his pay and allowances as a transferred member of the Marine Corps Reserve on active duty.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I have a committee amendment which I offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee amendment will take precedence. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. AYRES for the committee: Page 46, line 18, after the word "available," strike out the colon and all of the proviso down through the word "duty" in line 25.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, in explanation of that amendment, it has come to the notice of the committee in the last day or two, that this would be a discrimination against the Marine Corps, and not wishing to do that in favor of any other activity, we ask that this amendment be adopted and that the proviso be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Chairman, that is the amendment that I intended to offer, and I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

ALTERATIONS TO NAVAL VESSELS

Toward the alterations and repairs required for the purpose of modernizing the U. S. S. New Mexico, Mississippi, and Idaho, authorized by the act entitled "An act to authorize alterations and repairs to certain naval vessels," approved February 28, 1931 (to be completely accomplished within a total cost of $27,000,000), $14,000,000, this sum, together with the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $10,000,000 for the same purpose contained in the second deficiency act, fiscal year 1931, to be apportioned, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, among the aforesaid ships and to remain available until expended: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of the amount available for expenditure under this head for the fiscal year 1933 for employees in the field service assigned to Group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the Schedule of Wages for Civil Employees in the Field Service of the Navy Department shall not exceed $30,000.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to the language on page 50, line 7, after the comma, "in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, among the aforesaid ships." It is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve the point of order?

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. I would be glad to know why the gentleman wants to strike that out. I admit that it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. GOSS. It is subject to a point of order. The authorization act which passed August 17, 1923, Public Act No. 746, and also in the second deficiency appropriation bill provided that approximately an equal amount should be expended on each ship. That was the legislation passed by the Committee on Naval Affairs. This language does away with that authority and provides that under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy the money may be apportioned out in any way at all. Inasmuch as it is legislation on an appropriation bill, if it is desirable, no doubt the Committee on Naval Affairs can bring in a bill to do this very thing.

Mr. AYRES. I admit it is subject to a point of order, but I think that taking it out will cripple the Navy to a very great extent.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I disagree with the gentleman from Kansas. I think the gentleman from Connecticut is correct, because this expenditure was allocated for certain purposes.

Mr. AYRES. I have nothing further to say, if the gentleman wants to insist upon his point of order. I admit the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a few questions of the chairman of the committee. By what authority does the Committee on Appropriations reduce the original authorization of $30,000,000 for modernizing three battleships to $27,000,000?

Mr. AYRES. Because we felt in view of the fact that material and everything else has gone down in price that we could easily reduce the amount to $27,000,000.

Mr. BRITTEN. Did any individual representing the Navy Department come before the committee and request this reduction?

Mr. AYRES. Not at all.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, to show the further inconsistency of the Committee on Appropriations, they have arbitrarily, because they say the depression is on and that living is cheaper, reduced this amount from $30,000,000 to $27,000,000, without any expert advice, without any authority in the Navy Department requesting it. They have just taken 10 per cent off this on the theory that probably they may be right. The truth of the matter is that this reduction of $3,000,000 in the authorized cost, which has been approved by the Congress and appropriated for at various times by the Committee on Appropriations in the House and in the Senate, was an irreducible minimum. In fact, it will cost a little more than $30,000,000 to modernize those ships. Now, by stringing the construction out they will increase the overhead and increase the cost and incidentally waste in that way several hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. In a moment. If the committee of which the distinguished gentleman from New York is a member had taken the slightest expert advice, the slightest expert testimony, had asked for the slightest information from the department itself as to whether this reduction could be reasonably made in the interest of economy, they would not have brought in such a provision. These $3,000,000 will eventually come in a deficiency appropriation bill later on after we have wasted $100,000 or $200,000 in extended time and delays in an endeavor to meet the $27,000,000. I pledge my judgment against the gentleman's judgment that that is what will happen. I yield now to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. The gentleman does not believe that prices have gone down and that the Government of the United States should pay any attention to that sort of thing?

Mr. BRITTEN. Of course, I believe that prices have gone down. Everyone with an ounce of brains in his head knows that, but nobody from the Navy Department has said a word about the cost of these ships going down.

I am sure the gentleman from Kansas would not place his judgment against the judgment of the Navy Department as to how much was necessary to complete the modernization of a battleship. No one can foresee the various costs that are met in modernizing a great battleship. The gentleman's committee had no expert advice. It arbitrarily cut $3,000,000 on the idea of the gentleman from New York, who thinks that bananas and coconuts and cabbages are going into this construction rather than steel and highly specialized labor.

Mr. Chairman, on page 50 of the bill, explained on page 26 of the report, the authorized limit of cost for modernizing the New Mexico, Mississippi, and Idaho is reduced from $30,000,000 to $27,000,000, and $1,000,000 has been deducted from the Budget estimates for 1933, changing that item from $15,000,000 to $14,000,000.

The modernization of these three ships can not be completed for less than the present authorized limit of cost of $30,000,000 without deferring items of work which are considered necessary for satisfactory completion. The original authorization of $30,000,000 was based upon careful estimates of the cost of individual items which were considered necessary in the modernization of these vessels. This amount was authorized after extended hearings by the Naval Committee; plans were prepared for modernization along these lines; the ships have been stripped and much of the work has already been begun.

The original estimates aggregating approximately $30,000,000 were made with the expectation of completing the work within 21 months. Owing to the economic conditions the modernization of all of these vessels has already been extended from 5 to 15 months, notwithstanding the fact that it was realized that this extension of time limit would, by increasing the overhead, increase the total cost of the project. Due to this cause the total cost of the originally contemplated project has already gone beyond the limit and in order to absorb this within the original limitation, arrangements have already been made for deferring work which was originally contemplated to the extent of $913,000. At the time of the compilation of the estimates for 1933 this entire matter was very thoroughly considered. It was desired to reduce the estimate for 1933 to a minimum, but a careful survey showed that $15,000,000 was the absolute minimum for that year which could be appropriated and still permit the vessels to be completed within the $30,000,000 limitation without abandoning projects which were considered essential and which could not be deferred.

It is, therefore, considered very necessary that the original limitation of $30,000,000 imposed by Congress be restored and that the appropriation for this item for 1933 be increased to the Budget estimate of $15,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, unless this limit is restored the ships can not be put back in a satisfactory condition for service since they have been stripped and the work has been laid out and is being prosecuted for eventual completion in accordance with the limit originally stated in the authorizing act.

In case it is impossible to restore this $1,000,000 without a similar reduction in some other appropriation, though it is undesirable further to reduce the appropriation, "Increase of the Navy, construction and machinery," it now appears that delay in the progress of the work on the cruisers under construction in the Navy yards will make it possible for a further reduction in this appropriation to be made without serious interference with the work as it will progress during 1933. For that reason, if this $1,000,000 must be taken from some other appropriation, it is recommended that it be taken from "Increase of the Navy, construction and machinery," as shown on page 41, column 6, of the report, making the total reduction under that item $3,637,000 instead of $2,637,000 therein contemplated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is on the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia: Page 50, line 4, strike out the figures "$14,000,000" and insert the figures "$15,000,000."

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, this is not an increase of a dollar, because when we come to the next section, if this amendment is adopted, I shall ask that the next section be reduced by the same amount.

The reason I am doing that is that the Navy Department says they can save that million dollars on these new vessels, or not use that this year, without crippling the efficiency of the work, as the work on these is just beginning, but these battleships are now in dry dock. They have been there several months longer than is necessary. Every day they are there it costs between fifty and a hundred dollars additional. The Navy is asking that simply as a matter of economy and efficiency. They can save the loss on one, and they can not on the other.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman explain why his amendment does not increase the appropriation $1,000,000?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Yes. Ten million of this has already been appropriated. This provides $14,000,000, which only makes $24,000,000. There are $3,000,000 more to be appropriated before reaching the reduced appropriation of $27,000,000.

Mr. AYRES. But $14,000,000 is the appropriation we are proposing for 1933.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. That is true. But that does not take up all of the authorization of $27,000,000. Ten million dollars was appropriated last year.

Mr. AYRES. But there is no other way of figuring it than that it adds just $1,000,000 to the bill.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It will enable them to complete the ships that much sooner.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. It will enable them to complete the ships that much sooner and on time.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The total amount of the appropriation for the modernization of the vessels is $27,000,000.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. And $10,000,000 has already been appropriated.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. That is right.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. So there is the difference between $10,000,000 and $27,000,000 to be spent?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. That is right.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. And the gentleman is asking to increase it $1,000,000 now to enable them to finish the ships that much sooner?

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. That is true.

Mr. AYRES. Is the gentleman from Georgia in favor of increasing this appropriation $1,000,000?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I am in favor of every retrenchment possible, but I would not have the nerve or temerity, in the modernizing of a ship, to sit around a board and say, "We will arbitrarily reduce it," without the advice of experts who have to do the construction of it.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I think I must not have made myself clear.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, what amendment does the gentleman oppose?

Mr. TABER. The one that is before the House.

Mr. BRITTEN. Well, what is it?

Mr. TABER. I know what it is. Does the gentleman from Illinois not know what it is?

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, regular order.

Mr. TABER. Other Members of the House have been here and they know what is going on, and the gentleman from Illinois apparently does not. I observed the gentleman was here, but he does not know, apparently, what is going on. Everyone else in the House knows what is going on.

The proposition is just this, whether the membership of this House has enough common sense and enough knowledge of current conditions to know that most of the things connected with the modernization of a battleship are materials that are bought by the Navy Department to put into them. They know that the price of steel has gone down. They know that the price of labor in private plants has gone down, and they know that almost everything that is needed can be bought from factories for one-half to two-thirds what it would cost when this authorization bill was passed.

Now, in sitting around the board and agreeing to a cut in this authorization and in this appropriation, your committee did not have in mind that the work should be slowed down but that the department should take advantage of the savings which can be made as a result of that drop in prices, and that we should promote efficiency in the department. You know and I know that if they are compelled to do it they can adopt efficient methods, and they can save 10 per cent on the cost of these items, and they can get the job done just as quickly as they planned to do it at the start.

I know that a department always, when it has an authorization and when prices go down, wants to use it all by adding additional things to be done. That is the way they get by. That is the way those things work. With the present condition of the Treasury, it is up to the Congress to stick by those things which we originally had in mind when we reported this bill and stick to what the committee has done. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, were it not for the overstatement of my colleague from New York, I would not take any time of the committee. His justification for the decrease in the modernization item, I suppose, is based on efficiency methods of workmanship, and perhaps from past experience in modernizing other battleships. But when the gentleman from New York takes the floor and states that the price of material, the price of living, the price of labor has gone down from 50 per cent to two-thirds since the time this act was passed, I must take exception to that and clear the record of any such wild statement.

The act was approved February 28, 1931, and surely there has not been a decrease of 50 per cent or 75 per cent in the cost of material. There has not been a decrease of that extent in the wages of labor. We are not going to permit any such decrease in the cost of labor to be brought about in this country. So I say to my colleague from New York that I am with him in voting against this amendment, but I am sorry that he made such a rash statement not based upon any facts.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Is it not true that since this act was passed there has been a reduction in the price of basic materials entering into the modernization of these vessels?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; and let me say just a word to my colleagues, which I hope they will bear in mind between now and next Wednesday or Thursday: They can not think of cutting wages and think of inflating currency and increasing commodity prices at the same time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia: Page 50, line 2, after the figures "1931," strike out the parenthesis and the remainder of line 2, all of line 3 and line 4 to the figures $14,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

INCREASE OF THE NAVY

Construction and machinery: On account of hulls and outfits of vessels and machinery of vessels heretofore authorized, $23,063,000, and, in addition, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed, upon the request of the Secretary of the Navy, to make transfers during the fiscal year 1933 from the naval supply account fund to this appropriation of sums aggregating not to exceed $6,000,000, and the total sums hereby made available shall remain available until expended: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of the amount available for expenditure under the head of "Construction and Machinery" for the fiscal year 1933 for employees in the field service assigned to Group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the Schedule of Wages for Civil Employees in the Field Service of the Navy Department shall not exceed $790,000: Provided, That of the appropriations contained in this act under the head of "Increase of the Navy," there shall be available such sums as the Secretary of the Navy may from time to time determine to be necessary for the engagement of technical services, including the purchase of plans, and the employment of personnel in the Navy Department and in the field, in addition to those otherwise provided for, owing to the construction of vessels heretofore authorized and herein or heretofore appropriated for in part.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FISH: Page 51, at the end of line 15, add the following: "Provided further, That the President of the United States be requested to instruct the American delegates to the Disarmament Conference at Geneva to propose, on the basis of the 5–5–3 existing treaty ratio, a further reduction in the number of battleships and battle cruisers of over 10,000 tons."

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Yesterday Admiral Kittelle, of the Navy Department, spoke before the Daughters of the American Revolution and said that the United States Navy was now second in strength and was rapidly becoming the third in point of view of strength in comparison with the navies of Great Britain and Japan. Some years ago a very distinguished Member of this House, Mr. Bourke Cockran, of New York, informed the House that a second-best navy was like a second-best hand at poker, that it was not worth a darn. We are now informed that we have a second-best navy by an admiral of our Navy, and that it is rapidly becoming the third-best Navy.

I suggest, and suggest in all seriousness, that if the Members of the House want to economize and save a hundred million dollars annually without reducing the efficiency of our national defense, or of our Navy in any respect, the number of battleships and battle cruisers over 10,000 tons could be reduced just as was done in 1921 at the Washington conference. I ask any member of the committee if it is not a fact that should we reduce our battleships and battle cruisers from 18 to 10, and if Great Britian and Japan should reduce theirs proportionately, we would not have the same identical naval defense? I submit that we would have a better national defense, because at the present time we are not living up to the 5–5–3 ratio.

I am willing to vote appropriations now to live up to the big Navy on the 5–5–3 ratio, both for battleships over 10,000 tons and light cruisers under 10,000 tons; but see no sound reasons why we should not offer through our delegates at Geneva to further reduce the number of battleships and battle cruisers over 10,000 tons. If we really mean what we say about economy and balancing the Budget, I know of no better, easier, or more equitable way of reducing Federal expenditures without loss of efficiency or security.

We would have a better national defense if we agreed to reduce our battleships to 10 and the same number for Great Britain and 6 for Japan, because then the Appropriations Committee would probably be willing to recommend appropriations to maintain that ratio, at least, to maintain 10 battleships in the most modern and highest degree of efficiency. At the present moment the leaders of the House are sitting up at night and spending sleepless nights in trying to find ways and means to economize and to reduce appropriations. If my proposal were put into effect, we could reduce appropriations over $100,000,000 annually and still have exactly the same efficiency in the Navy, the same national defense, and the same proportional naval protection for the United States. I do not refer to the 10,000-ton cruisers and below. They are used for the protection of commerce, and we have far more than most nations, but the big battleships in war time are generally held in the ports, kept there by fear of submarines.

I say to you that Great Britain and Japan ought to welcome a proposal to further reduce the number of their battleships and battle cruisers over 10,000 tons on the 5–5–3 basis because they are more debt-ridden and more burdened with taxes than we are, and the Lord knows our taxpayers are burdened enough. So it seems to me to be simply sound common sense to at least have our delegates at Geneva make such an offer or proposal at the present time. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I made the point of order against this amendment because it instructed our representatives at the disarmament conference at Geneva to follow a course without having in mind the military aspects or the military properties or values to the United States of the different classes of ships of the fleet.

The representatives of our admiralty have told us time and again that it is absolutely necessary that we have battleships because we have not fuel stations and all that sort of thing all over the world. I personally am not an expert on fighting battleships and I can not testify along that line; but I believe that when we go into a conference to pass on what our Navy needs and what we should have to defend America our best fighting men should be the judges of the types of ships that we keep and the types that we permit others to keep and build by treaty.

We have at that conference representatives of the Navy Department and of the State Department. I believe it is for them to judge what we should do.

Now, with reference to our battleships, we are keeping our battleships right up to the mark. They are up to the 5–5–3 ratio, and that is the best judgment of our naval experts.

With reference to cruisers and the other supplementary ships, we are bringing in this bill appropriations to carry our Navy along as fast as it can be carried within the limitations of the treaty and just as fast as our department says they expect to be able to go.

We have not any authority to begin the building of the smaller grade of cruisers.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. There is authority, is there not, to provide for the construction of destroyers, as provided for in 1916?

Mr. TABER. There were some provided for last year and there is a provision for carrying along the construction of those on which work has commenced. More could be provided; but it is better, in my opinion, to go ahead and establish a policy of building some and letting our designers get into shape so they can do a good job on building a destroyer and not go ahead with mass construction and perhaps make a mistake and have a lot of poor tonnage. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Secretary of the Navy, $200,520.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VINSON of Georgia: Page 54, line 24, strike out "$200,520" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "$191,500; and section 4 of the act entitled 'An act to authorize the construction and procurement of aircraft and aircraft equipment in the Navy and Marine Corps and to adjust and define the status of the operating personnel in connection therewith,' approved June 24, 1926 (44 Stat. L. 767, 768), be and the same is hereby repealed as of June 30, 1932."

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I may state to the committee that the object and purpose of the amendment is to abolish the position in the Navy of Assistant Secretary for Aeronautics, a similar provision having been unanimously reported by the Naval Affairs Committee.

When we created the office of Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Aeronautics we all felt that aviation was in its infancy and needed the strong arm of some civilian to support that branch of the service, but to-day aviation is an integral part of the Navy and there is absolutely no need or necessity of having an assistant secretary for aviation any more than you would have an assistant secretary for battleships or for cruisers or submarines.

The matter was heard in the Naval Affairs Committee a few days ago, and met with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy.

Understand, there is no reflection intended upon the person who has occupied this office in the past or now. We have been fortunate in having two very able Assistant Secretaries of the Navy for Aeronautics, Professor Warner and the present Assistant Secretary, Mr. Ingalls. They are very distinguished aviators, but the Navy Department does not need them and they do not need a similar office in the War Department, and a similar bill has already been introduced with respect to the War Department dealing with that office.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. By what authority does the gentleman say the position is not needed in the War Department? Is the gentleman acquainted with military affairs?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I was a member of the Morrow Board that authorized this office. He thought then it was necessary to harmonize the friction that was existing in the two branches of the service and to dovetail aviation into them. That need no longer exists. You can not run an army without aviation, and you can not run a navy without aviation. Every officer now knows the necessity of aviation, and there is no need of a separate establishment or a separate chief at the head of such service.

Mr. GOSS. I think the gentleman has answered the question——

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GOSS (continuing). When the gentleman says there is need for aviation and that you could not run a navy or an army without it. Therefore I think we must have a head to this department.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Of course, you could not run an army without the infantry or the artillery, but you would not, therefore, think for one moment of having an Assistant Secretary of War for artillery or for infantry.

I was a member of the board that recommended this to the Congress, and the very reason we did this in 1926 was to stimulate aviation and to make the older officers see that Congress was going to legislate to take care of aviation. Since they have put aviation officers on the general staff in the Army, there is no need of having a separate civilian secretary just for aviation alone, and that has been his sole jurisdiction in the Army and in the Navy.

So the Committee on Naval Affairs has unanimously reported this bill, and, of course, what I am now seeking to do refers entirely to the Navy Department. We will cross the bridge with respect to the Army when we come to it.

Mr. GOSS. I thought the gentleman was referring to the Army.

Mr. FRENCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. FRENCH. Ordinarily, it would seem that legislation of this kind should not be considered on an appropriation bill——

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Let me say to the gentleman that this is in order under the Holman rule.

Mr. FRENCH. I think it is in order, but, on the other hand, it does involve a very large principle. May I ask whether or not the gentleman's committee had hearings upon the subject?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The committee last Monday had the distinguished Secretary of the Navy before it, and, after some inquiry of him, the Secretary said he had no objection to the favorable consideration of this bill, and upon a roll call the committee voted unanimously to abolish the office of Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Aeronautics. It is a useless office.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think all I need do to point out the danger of this amendment is to recall to the older Members the condition in the Air Service of the Navy prior to the enactment of the law which created the office of Assistant Secretary of the Navy for Aeronautics.

Aviation is still in its infancy, and every Member of the House will recall the scandal that took place in the Army and the condition in the Navy, the conflict between the line officers and fliers. If the gentleman of the House will stop to consider that we are spending millions of dollars for new flying equipment, and now that we have the Air Service of the Navy in good condition, with good morale, by reason of having established a separate bureau, at the head of which is now an able executive and a distinguished flier that men have confidence in, the procurement of material has been under proper supervision, economies have been made, the equipment is better, the personnel is better, and I say that we should not at this time, on the spur of the moment, with only a few Members present, abolish this office.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. This proposition was investigated by the Naval Affairs Committee, and the committee had the Secretary of the Navy before it, and the Secretary of the Navy said that there was absolutely no need or necessity for this office.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the gentleman knows that before the Morrow investigating committee the then Secretary of the Navy made the same argument, and next year or 10 years from now whoever is Secretary of the Navy will repeat the same argument.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. We established this office for doing what has been accomplished; that is, to stimulate and give aviation its right place in the Navy.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If the gentleman wants to destroy all the good that has been accomplished, if he wants to put aviation back under the control of persons who are not in sympathy with it, who do not understand it, then abolish this office.

It is a fact that the Secretary of the Navy appeared before the committee, and did indorse it, and what he says is nothing new. We know that the great Committee on Naval Affairs is susceptible to the influence of the department—it always has been; it is a tradition of the committee, and I have no fault to find with it. But let me say to the gentleman from Georgia, and he is a student of the history of the Navy, that every new invention has been resisted and fought by the admirals of the Navy—the ironclad, the Ericsson propeller, the Whitehead torpedo, and the Lewis machine gun—every new invention or weapon has been resisted and fought by the admirals of the Navy. I would like to have Members read the life of Ericsson, published a few years ago, which will disclose the stand-pat attitude of the officials of the Navy Department to anything that is new.

The position of Assistant Secretary of Aviation is something that Congress has established, and I submit, gentlemen, that having gone through with two investigations, and having written the law, and having created the separate office for that branch of the service, we ought not to dispense with it in this summary manner. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those hard-boiled members of the Appropriations Committee who hates to spend a cent, and I guess the gentleman from New York will tell you that I am probably the worst one. Am I right?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman is right. [Laughter.]

Mr. TABER. I believe in keeping appropriations down, without impairing the national defense. I do not believe in spending anything that we do not absolutely have to spend.

As the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] told you, this office was created for the purpose of seeing that aviation got a chance to develop in the Navy.

Now, I think we all must realize that aviation, properly developed and properly looked after, is perhaps the most important military branch of our Government. I believe that if we are going to keep it to the mark, if we are going to keep up the work in the development of aviation, we should see that it goes along to the very best advantage, and we ought to have a civilian over our military men who will give us the best development in aviation that any nation can have. For that reason I am going to vote against this proposition. The salary is a minor item compared with what one who gives his time, with considerable business experience back of him, can save to the country in the manner in which contracts are let and in the manner in which the appropriation is administered. I believe we really save many times the salary that the aviation secretary gets if we keep him there and he continues to follow the thing through like a good civilian business man would follow them all along the line.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I notice the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia is to change the sum in line 24, page 54, in the office of the Secretary of the Navy, and that on page 55 there is a provision for the Bureau of Aeronautics to the amount of $290,400. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Bureau of Aeronautics is not tied up in any way with the Secretary of Aviation?

Mr. TABER. The Bureau of Aeronautics expenditures are different than those of the Secretary.

Mr. ARENTZ. Does the gentleman not think that is duplication?

Mr. TABER. I think it is a proper classification to have the Assistant Secretary directly under the Secretary's office rather than under the Bureau of Aeronautics.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with every effort to effect wise economies, but since this amendment is not in order on this bill, and since all Members of the House are in agreement that if this action is taken in respect to the Navy similar action should be taken in the Army, and since the committee has been told that legislation looking to this end will be submitted to the House in a regular and orderly way, I hope the House will not adopt this amendment. It would be improper to seek by an amendment, which is not in order on this bill, to eliminate a position that has served in a most helpful way the Air Service of the Navy, and likewise in a helpful way the Air Service of the Army. Whether the House should later decide that these two places could be dispensed with it is not now necessary to discuss. The gentleman from Georgia states that a bill from his committee, which has authority to legislate on such matters, will be presented seeking to accomplish what is proposed in the pending amendment. The House will then have full opportunity to discuss the matter in an orderly way, and I hope the gentleman from Georgia, evidencing his accustomed spirit of fairness, will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

CONTINGENT EXPENSES

For professional and technical books and periodicals, law books, and necessary reference books, including city directories, railway guides, freight, passenger, and express tariff books and photostating, for department library; for purchase of photographs, maps, documents, and pictorial records of the Navy, photostating and other necessary incidental expenses in connection with the preparation for publication of the naval records of the war with the Central Powers of Europe; for stationery, furniture, newspapers, plans, drawings, and drawing materials; purchase and exchange of motor trucks or motor delivery wagons, maintenance, repair, and operation of motor trucks or motor delivery wagons; garage rent; street-car fares not exceeding $500; freight, expressage, postage, typewriters, and computing machines, and other absolutely necessary expenses of the Navy Department and its various bureaus and offices, $80,000; it shall not be lawful to expend, unless otherwise specifically provided herein, for any of the offices or bureaus of the Navy Department in the District of Columbia, any sum out of appropriations made for the naval service for any of the purposes mentioned or authorized in this paragraph: Provided, That any unexpended or unobligated balances under appropriations for salaries in the Navy Department for the fiscal year 1932 may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, be expended for the purchase, exchange, or rental of labor-saving devices during the fiscal year 1933.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order to the proviso on page 57, line 23, down to the end of the paragraph.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, in order to save time I admit the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

PRINTING AND BINDING

For printing and binding for the Navy Department and the Naval Establishment executed at the Government Printing Office, $550,000, including not exceeding $103,000 for the Hydrographic Office and $2,800 for the Naval Reserve Officers' Training Corps.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to briefly state to the committee that I have read the bill and the report most carefully and wish to go on record expressing my general approval of the work of the subcommittee in bringing the House the bill in its present shape. In my judgment the committee has rendered great service to the country in making reductions, and at the same time doing no great injustice to this arm of our national defense. Of course there are a great many items in the bill which if I were a member of the subcommittee I would not have inserted the language contained in the bill, but in the main the committee has done a great service and deserves the thanks of the House for making these reductions and at the same time not impairing the general efficiency of the Navy.

I call the attention of the committee and that of the country to the fact that the country has an idea that the Army and the Navy are two extravagant branches of our Government and that many millions of dollars are wasted in that way. I want to place in the RECORD some facts to show how the money we appropriate from year to year is allocated and what per cent goes to the Navy and what per cent to the Army. The legislative appropriation bill for the last six years has been increased by 59 per cent. The Veterans' Bureau appropriation has been increased in that time by 114 per cent, the independent offices in the same years by 242 per cent, the Agricultural Department in the same years has been increased by 115 per cent, the Commerce Department by 77 per cent, the Justice Department by 101 per cent, the Labor Department has been increased 61 per cent, the Post Office Department in the last six years has been increased 14 per cent, and the Treasury Department increased 62 per cent. The District of Columbia has been increased in its appropriations 34 per cent in the same time and the War Department in that time has been increased by 29 per cent.

The Navy Department, the arm of national defense which must be ready at all times to meet any and all national emergencies, has only been increased 11 per cent. This bill has reduced the Budget estimate about $14,000,000, and yet, with the distribution of the $326,000,000 carried in the bill, the committee has so distributed it as not to seriously impair the efficiency of the national defense. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. No appropriation under the Navy Department available during the fiscal years 1932 and/or 1933 shall be used after the date of the approval of this act (1) to increase the compensation of any position within the grade to which such position has been allocated under the classification act of 1923, as amended, (2) to increase the compensation of any position in the field service the pay of which is adjustable to correspond so far as may be practicable to the rates established by such act as amended for the departmental service in the District of Columbia, (3) to increase the compensation of any position under such act through reallocation, (4) to increase the compensation of any person in any grade under such act through advancement to another position in the same grade or to a position in a higher grade at a rate in excess of the minimum rate of such higher grade unless such minimum rate would require an actual reduction in compensation, or (5) to increase the compensation of any other civil position under the Navy Department: Provided, That from the date of this act to and including June 30, 1933, payment for personal services made in accordance herewith shall constitute payment in full for such services. The appropriations or portions of appropriations unexpended by the operation of this section shall not be used for any other purposes, but shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury, and a report of the amounts so impounded for the period between the date of the approval of this act and October 31, 1932, shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next regular session.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: Beginning on line 1, page 61, strike out all of section 2.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, this amendment was called to the attention of the subcommittee in advance, and we have discussed it with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Since this provision was omitted from the Interior Department appropriation bill as it passed the House, and since we are informed it will be later offered under a rule making it applicable to all of the departments, we have felt it could be omitted from this particular bill. The House was assured, when this provision was inserted in the first bill, that if passed it would be made to apply to every other appropriation bill. For that reason, and knowing that it will be presented so as to give the House an opportunity to determine whether it shall affect all departments and other Government agencies alike, the committee will not oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman will also recall that the House did express itself once on a record vote on the Post Office Department-Treasury bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to strike out section 2.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may change the section numbers.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the section numbers will be changed by the Clerk.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. No part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used for maintaining, driving, or operating any Government-owned motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle not used exclusively for official purposes; and "official purposes" shall not include the transportation of officers and employees between their domiciles and places of employment except in cases of medical officers on out-patient medical service and except in cases of officers and employees engaged in field work the character of whose duties makes such transportation necessary, and then only as to such latter cases when the same is approved by the head of the department. This section shall not apply to any motor vehicle for official use of the Secretary of the Navy, and no other persons connected with the Navy Department or the naval service, except the commander in chief of the United States Asiatic Fleet, Marine Corps officers serving with expeditionary forces in foreign countries, and medical officers on out-patient medical service, shall have a Government-owned motor vehicle assigned for their exclusive use.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Goss: Page 62, in line 18, after the word "Navy," insert "and the Assistant Secretaries of the Navy."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment is to allow official automobiles for the assistant Cabinet members, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and the Assistant Secretary of the Navy in charge of air. They are allowed automobiles to-day to go to their official work in Washington, and it seems to me, in view of the many calls upon them, they should be allowed motor transportation the same as the Secretary of the Navy. They take the place of the Secretary of the Navy when he is not able to go on official business, and I trust the committee will adopt that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FULLER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11452) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the vote on the amendments and the final passage of the bill be deferred until a later date.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, what is the future date? I intend to offer a motion to recommit, and I want to be present when the vote is taken.

Mr. AYRES. I will say to the gentleman for his benefit that we have not yet decided on that later date, but that I will notify the gentleman when that date will be.

Mr. SCHAFER. With that assurance, so that I can offer the 10 per cent reduction in a motion to recommit, if I can obtain recognition for that purpose, I shall not object.

Mr. AYRES. I will notify the gentleman.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are quite a number of Members who would like to have the time limit indicated, within which it will not be voted upon.

Mr. AYRES. I will state to the gentleman that it will not be before Thursday of next week.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to understand the situation. When the previous question is ordered on a bill and the vote is not taken on that day, under the rules of the House it would come up on the next legislative day. That would be on next Monday. The understanding of the Chair is that there was a virtual agreement among the gentlemen in control of the bill, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr.

BYRNS], that the consideration of this bill would be postponed until next Wednesday. The Chair would like to know whether or not that agreement has been changed to Thursday?

Mr. AYRES. I will state that it has been changed, Mr. Speaker. My understanding was that next Wednesday would be Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. Calendar Wednesday business under the special order heretofore agreed to will be considered next Tuesday instead of on next Wednesday. Ordinarily the time to take up this bill would be on next Wednesday. That was the understanding which the Chair had.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, after the conference with the Speaker, there were further conferences held, and it was found wholly impracticable for Members of the Pennsylvania delegation to return by next Wednesday. These Members had come to Washington to-day upon a wire request from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DARROW] expecting to vote to-day upon the Darrow amendment, only to find that the vote will not be had to-day.

These Members find that it will be impracticable, on account of the fact that Tuesday is primary election day in Pennsylvania, to be here by Wednesday. Therefore it will be necessary for them to have the vote deferred until Thursday if they are to be accommodated. It is my understanding that this arrangement is agreeable to the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. AYRES].

Mr. AYRES. It is perfectly agreeable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will interpret the unanimous-consent agreement to be that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES] shall control the time as to when he will call up the bill for consideration.

Is there objection?

There was no objection.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the subject of vocational education, and to include some excerpts from a statement made by President Hoover.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, vocational education is one of the important activities in which our public-school system is engaged. Now, it is sought by the Economy Committee to eliminate the appropriation for this work and thus throw 1,250,000 boys and girls out of our public schools. This it is proposed to do under the guise of economy. The mere intimation has surprised and stunned the parents of this vast army of boys and girls who are now in the midst of their vocational courses. The mere suggestion that this important phase of public-school work be suspended even for one year has alarmed the people throughout the country and aroused their bitter opposition to it. This is not strange, for if there is any one institution in this country that has the confidence and the whole-hearted support of the American people it is our public-school system.

Those who are at present urging and insisting that the pupils now enrolled in vocational education be set adrift ought to know that such a move is not economy but national calamity.

How great will be the economic loss to the Nation if these boys and girls are deprived of the opportunity to complete their courses? Let us keep in mind that there are 1,250,000 now enrolled in vocational courses. The most exhaustive survey made by heads of industry and by educators has shown that, based upon the future earning capacity, the return to each child for each day spent in school is from $9 to $10 a day. The time spent by each student in a vocational school each year is about 200 days. It is obvious that, based upon $9 a day for each child that attends school for 200 days, the return will amount to $1,800. On the same basis it follows that 1,250,000 vocational students will earn a future return for each school year the sum of $2,250,000,000. To destroy this potential earning capacity of a generation of boys and girls is too great an economic loss to the Nation to justify the suspension of public-school work even for one year. Aside from this, the injustice to the children and the parents would be deplorable.

The result achieved in industrial and agricultural education under Federal legislation has been characterized "an impressive tribute to the wisdom of Congress."

Even during the time the students are in school, the money appropriated by the Federal Government for vocational agricultural education is a paying investment. A survey covering a period of five years shows this. For example, a boy who elects to take vocational agriculture is required to devote six months in some practical work on the farm under the supervision of his teacher. Accurate cost accounts have been kept for the 5-year period to ascertain the labor income from this practical work. The total labor income from this source during a period of five years amounted to $23,637,924.25. The total amount appropriated by the Federal Government and utilized for this worth-while activity during this 5-year period was $10,418,460.

With the assurance that the Federal Government would perform its legislative commitments, the States have set up vocational programs. In many communities new buildings have been erected at local expense, and in many instances at considerable local sacrifice in order to provide the necessary facilities to properly teach vocational agriculture. This has been done because the local people have felt that the Federal Government would keep faith with them.

Legislatures in many States have now adjourned. They had no warning of this proposal of the Economy Committee to disrupt the educational program of the States; therefore, the States are powerless to come to the rescue.

Now that the opposition to the suspension of Federal aid for vocational education in the States has developed into a veritable storm of protest, I understand from press reports, that the Economy Committee is considering an alternative proposal equally objectionable. The plan now contemplated by the Economy Committee is to continue the allotment for vocational education for one year and then suspend or curtail it. This is an attempt to quietly and gradually strangle vocational education rather than destroy it at this time by direct action. It is an effort to accomplish indirectly that which it dare not do directly. The motive is now clear and unmistakable.

The chief objective is not Federal retrenchment to meet a present emergency. It is an effort to destroy vocational education in the public schools. Even under the latest proposal, the children in those States where the legislature meets only once in four years, would suffer through the closing of the vocational schools at the end of one year. The schools in other States would be placed under a cloud of uncertainty. This new proposal is more reprehensible than the first, because its purpose is not economy but rather an attempt to commit Congress to a policy of hostility to a phase of public education that has proved most beneficial to the masses. It is sought to achieve this reversal of our national educational policy under a gag rule that will afford no opportunity whatever for the friends of education to protect the rights of the public schools. I feel that the issue is too vital to the country to warrant such hasty and ill-advised procedure.

Should the Economy Committee succeed in its proposal, it is not the children of the rich who will suffer. The blow will fall upon the children whose parents are of modest means. It will hit hardest those parents who are without work. The chief comfort and the only hope that now comes to such parents is the assurance that their children are able to continue in school. This comfort and this hope should not be ruthlessly destroyed.

In 1922, President Hoover, when a member of the Cabinet, made this statement:

> Clearly, if economic waste is reprehensible, waste of child life, whether viewed economically or in terms of common and universal betterment, is a blight that in its measure is more deplorable than war.
> It may be worth recounting that our system of individualism can only stand if we can make effective the supreme ideal of America. This ideal is that there shall be an equality of opportunity for every citizen to reach that position in the community to which his intelligence, abilities, character, and ambition entitle him. I am a strong believer in this progressive individualism as the only road to economic, social, and spiritual safety and to human progress. Without this tempering ideal that America has evolved, individualism will not stand.

There is no equality of opportunity where children are allowed by law and compelled by parents to labor during the years they should receive instruction; there is no equality of opportunity unless this instruction is made compulsory by the State.

There is no equality of opportunity for children whose parents are not restrained by law from exploiting them, and compelled to give them participation in the beneficial privileges that the State provides for them.

Progress will march if we hold an abiding faith in the intelligence, the initiative, the character, the courage, and the divine touch in the individual. We can safeguard these ends if we give to each individual that opportunity for which the spirit of America stands. We can make a social system as perfect as our generation merits and one that will be received in gratitude by our children.

Again in 1923, while a member of the Cabinet, President Hoover expressed his attitude with reference to vocational education in these words:

My attention has been called to comments in the press on the increasing cost of education, and more particularly of vocational education in our public schools * * *. This cost can not be regarded as constituting a serious financial burden upon the community. It is approximately the cost of a medium-sized battleship. Certain indirect costs of this form of education can not be accurately estimated, but in the aggregate they are relatively to our wealth and population insignificant. If vocational education is worth while, certainly as a nation we can afford the price of such education. Our only concern is to know that it is worth while. If it is, expenditure on account of such education is in the nature of an investment which will yield large dividends from year to year through the progressive increase of labor skill and industrial efficiency.

As a member of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, I have for the past two years been brought into close contact with those who are administering the Federal vocational education act, providing for cooperation of the Federal Government with the States in the promotion of vocational education in our public schools.

The essential purpose of this act is to extend public-school education to provide for the needs of our youth who do not enter our higher technical and professional educational institutions. We are accustomed to large expenditures for the maintenance of these higher educational institutions. In some of our State universities the cost of providing education for the professions runs well into the thousands of dollars per student graduated. Vocational training for the commoner wage earning pursuits and skilled trades is equally as essential as is training for the professions. The humblest worker equally with the youth who proposes to enter the professions has a right to the sort of training he needs for the occupation by which he proposes to earn his livelihood and support his family, and through which he will render his service to the community in getting the community's work done. For him the cost of vocational training is relatively small, and is in fact a cost in appearance only, since the result of his training will be increase in efficiency and economy in production during the life period of his economic productivity.

We in this country believe that education in general pays for itself and is worth while; and if this is true of any sort of education, it is certainly true of vocational education. * * *

Men of affairs the country over are being impressed with the fact that the cost of training labor on the job is one of the great industrial costs, but they know that the cost of inefficiency and lack of training is very much greater, and that labor must be trained whatever the cost. If they or the community do not provide such training, they can not compete with the foreign producer whose labor is vocationally trained at public expense, nor can we as a nation adequately supply our own needs for the product of labor if we neglect to provide for the training of labor.

The cost of providing this training is just as properly a charge upon the public revenue as any other form of education. In the interests of labor itself such training can not be devolved upon the employer. Organized labor is perfectly right in insisting that vocational education shall be under public supervision and control, so that the interests and welfare of the worker as well as of the employer will be taken fairly into account. The cost of such training certainly should not be put upon the individual worker unless we are prepared to abandon our traditional policy of providing free education and equality of opportunity for our youth. We can not in fairness continue to provide specialized education free to the few who propose to enter the professions, while denying education to the many for the commoner vocations.

A community must pay either for the cost of training labor or for the much greater cost of inefficiency of labor, and inefficiency of labor means inevitably general industrial and commercial inefficiency.

Further, it may be noted that in so far as the products of American labor come into competition with the products of foreign labor, either in our own domestic market or in foreign markets, unemployment for American labor is bound to develop in proportion as foreign labor is better trained and more efficient. No American employer can hold his markets and continue to employ labor, if his labor is relatively unskilled or if his costs for training labor greatly exceed those of his foreign competitors.

Every important foreign country, European and American, is providing for the vocational training of its citizens. Some of these countries are developing programs which contemplate very large expenditures of public money. They are relying in a large measure upon vocational training in their effort to master the commerce of the world in competition with the United States. Several of these countries have, during the past two years, sent delegations to this country to investigate and report upon our system of vocational education. Such delegations have come also from Japan, China, India, and Australia.

Can we expect to maintain our commercial standing in the world's markets if we neglect to train our labor, and if we permit other countries to take over the competitive advantages that superior vocational training will give them?

* * * There is, in fact, no better economy than the economy of adequate training for the pursuits of agriculture, commerce, industry, and the home. Our youth must enter into these pursuits and it is in the public interest that they be well trained for them.

To provide such training is clearly a public responsibility. Education in general, including vocational education for the youth, is democracy's most important business. Democracy in education means that in the field of education opportunity shall be extended equally to all—to give all a fair start. This is the educational ideal inspiring those who are administering the Federal vocational education act; it is the ideal which inspired Congress in passing the act; and it is traditionally the ideal of education in our democracy.

I want to urge each Member of the House of Representatives to register his disapproval of this attempt to destroy the effective and constructive work that is now being carried on by the vocational schools throughout the United States.

Let us remember the words of Webster:

If we work upon marble, it will perish; if we work upon brass, time will efface it; if we rear temples, they will crumble to the dust; but if we work on men's immortal minds, if we imbue them with high principles, with the just fear of God and love for their fellow men, we engrave on these tablets something which no time can efface and which will brighten to all eternity.

CONGRESS SHOULD NOT ADJOURN

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the present economic condition of the country.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, in the summer of 1929 I was in several countries in Europe. I found that if the tariff bill then pending before the Senate should become law, American trade would be almost destroyed. What I found has come true. In 1929 our total exports were about $5,000,000,000, and in 1930 less than $4,000,000,000, and in 1931 only about two and one-half billion dollars. In two or three more years our exports will vanish, if the present conditions are allowed to prevail. Unless the Democratic Party comes into power, led by a man with brain and nerve to attack and destroy the strangle hold that the selfish and monopolistic interests have now got upon the throats of the producers of America, and unless the Congress elected at the same time will follow the leadership of such a President, the future of America is indeed dark.

It is idle to hope for any relief if Herbert Hoover is reelected President. The first thing that he did after being inaugurated in 1929 was to call Congress into extra session to revise upward the Republican tariff law of 1922, and with his leadership and approval they built a Chinese wall around America.

Even to-day the farmers of the South could buy sulphate of ammonia at $20 a ton to fertilize their cotton crops, except for this iniquitous tariff law, which is holding cargoes at Charleston and New York, loaded with sulphate of ammonia, until the importers shall give bond to pay $10 a ton additional as duty. Thus the $10 a ton will be passed to the farmer, if he is able to buy, and will be taken out of his pocket and put into the pocket of the United States Steel Corporation, and other smelters and producers of pig iron and steel, who produce sulphate of ammonia as a by-product of their coke ovens. This sulphate of ammonia probably cost them as a by-product 10 or 12 dollars a ton, and yet, due to the tariff, they will make the farmers who buy it pay them nearly $30 a ton.

While Herbert Hoover was in a hurry to revise, upward, the Republican tariff of 1922, and called the special session of Congress for that purpose, yet in the early fall of 1931, when Members of Congress of both parties importuned him with tears and prayers to call an extra session of Congress in order to provide against the catastrophes and calamities that seemed to be crowding upon our people as winter approached, he turned a deaf ear to such application. He took into his own hands the unconstitutional authority to postpone the payment by foreign countries of their installments due on December 1, 1931, and then induced Congress to ratify his unconstitutional and illegal act, by claiming that he had saved the world from chaos, and had rescued America, along with the rest of the world, from common and universal ruin. If Congress had met in special session in the fall of 1931, and had passed the Glass-Steagall banking law, for loosening the frozen assets of banks, and to pass a law guaranteeing bank depositors against losses, and to authorize and require the Federal Reserve Board to use its vast powers to raise commodity prices, then there would have been no need for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. But due to his hesitating, faltering, shilly-shallying policy, the structure of American business has grown weaker day by day.

Now we are frankly told by the German Government that it will never pay another cent of war reparations and indemnities to our allies and associates, and England, one of our chief allies, has left out of her budget any item for the payment of her annual installment on her debt to America. Doubtless France and Italy and Belgium and the other nations will follow the same course. In December, 1931, there were $252,000,000 in gold in New York banks, deposited by those European nations to pay their December installment. But they would not pay because of Herbert Hoover's unconstitutional and illegal promise that they need not pay. He and his big-business associates bastinadoed a timid Congress into ratifying his illegal action. We let slip the $252,000,000 in gold, which was our last chance at a single cent of European repayment. It seemed to Herbert Hoover fine policy to play favors with international bankers who wanted our Government to forego collection of money due her, in order that these international bankers might collect that same $252,000,000 on debts due them.

It seemed statesmanship to Herbert Hoover for the American Congress to authorize $2,000,000,000 for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to save big business, and especially to put cash into the hands of the big investment international bankers. The records will show that practically all the money lent to insurance companies, railroads, and mortgage investment companies has found its way into the hands of these investment bankers. But when a proposition is advanced that will help and relieve 95 per cent of the 123,000,000 people who do the labor and fight the battles for America, Herbert Hoover and his allies, including the chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, use their "damns" and other forms of profanity to stigmatize it as uneconomic and dangerous.

God in His mercy and goodness has sent us two winters of mild weather. The suffering of the people was greatly minimized by that mildness. Dare we approach another winter with confidence and belief that such third winter will also be mild? If we dare not, then this Congress dare not adjourn until the first Monday in December, 1932. Herbert Hoover would not call Congress into session, whatever the public disaster might be and however many millions of people might be starving and freezing and dying, as has been demonstrated by his conduct in the fall of 1931.

This Congress should recess about the 1st of June, to be reconvened the middle of September, and if conditions are favorable, it can recess for 30-day periods until the 1st of December, but it dare not adjourn. If it does, Herbert Hoover will repeat his unconstitutional and illegal conduct in the management of international and national affairs, and the people will stagger on into a terrible winter of unemployment, with no prospect of improvement nor betterment.

Just a word of warning. And I deliberately use conservative language. I dare not express fully, in words to be printed, what is in my mind. If Herbert Hoover and his advisers, consisting of selfish and narrow investment bankers, continue to stand in the way of every proposition to increase commodity prices and to make it possible for the farmer and the small business man and the small banker to save his home and his business, and support his family, then upon their heads will be the consequences of such conduct.

If this coming winter should be severe, and if unemployment is not materially reduced, the people whose reserves have been exhausted and whose patience is well nigh exhausted will not endure what they have endured. Let those who have garnered to their selfish souls the greater part of the fruits of the labor of the people of this Nation for the last generation take warning from the lessons of history. Let them read the history of France from the year 1775 to the year 1800. It was that 25 years of French history that brought about a change that in turn changed the face of the civilized world. Let them read English history. Let them read Italian history. Yea, let them read German history. If they do not learn history, they will thereby unwittingly help to make some unfortunate history for this beloved America, that has given them their countless wealth and has given them their exalted stations.

THE PHILIPPINES AND THE CRISIS OF FAITH

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address by myself at the annual banquet of the Organized Bible Class Association, Washington, D. C., April 22, 1932:

My presence here this evening as your guest of honor and speaker is largely due to Congressman ALLEN, of Illinois, whose kind words of presentation I greatly appreciate and whom I shall remember as the first man to congratulate me and extend the glad hand of fellowship after my speech on the floor of Congress closing the debate on the Philippine independence bill. In that memorable session my good friend and colleague and 305 other Members voted in favor of the passage of that bill. My people are earnestly praying that the bill, H. R. 7233, will be favorably acted upon soon by the Senate and approved by the President. That act will strengthen the faith of 13,000,000 people in themselves and in the people of the United States.

It is refreshing to be in the company of representative men and women who are interested in the higher and nobler things of life and in all that contribute to a revival of confidence in a world suffering from the present crisis of faith. I selected "The Philippines and the Crisis of Faith" as my theme for my brief speech.

The history of the Filipino people demonstrates the persistence of their faith in a sublime ideal. It likewise shows their faith in culture and religion as necessary and essential in the realization of that ideal.

The Filipinos have had an experience that is unusual and unique. They inhabit a country that lies at the crossroads of the great streams of cultures and religions. They have received the influences of the main currents of the civilizations of both the East and the West.

The Philippine question being one of the pressing contemporary problems before the Government of the United States, it is well that the people of this country should acquaint themselves with the nature of the people with whom they have to deal to solve this question.

My people have a rich inheritance of culture. They had early relations with the peoples of Malaysia, of China, of Arabia, and of India. Through such contacts there naturally arose an interplay and interaction of customs, practices, cultures, and beliefs.

Besides the influences of the cultures of the Orient, ours has been the unique experience of having received in a very direct manner the impacts of two main streams of occidental civilizations, the Latin and the Anglo-Saxon; the Latin because of our association with Europeans, especially after the opening of the Suez Canal and with Mexico and other countries influenced by Spain in the Western Hemisphere, and the Anglo-Saxons because of our contacts with the British and during the last three decades with the Americans. From these bare statements you can appreciate the significance of my statement when I say that we not only have had an unusual experience as a people but a unique opportunity, if permitted to lead a life unhampered and untrammeled, to evolve a civilization which shall represent a happy blending of the best in the Orient and the Occident.

As a group of Christians banded for this organized Bible movement, you must be interested in the religious beliefs of the Filipinos. As I have stated, we as a people are devoted to education and religion. We have a deep and abiding faith in the necessity and value of spirituality.

Our primitive religion was what I have often called "Anitism." It was a simple religion analogous to the Animism of other primitive peoples. It consisted of a belief in and worship of "anitos," or spirits of various sorts. From our dealings with other oriental peoples, that early religion was influenced and modified by Brahmanism, Buddhism, and Islamism. Later, through the implantation of Spanish rule and the coming of missionaries from Europe, Christianity was introduced. It found ready acceptance among the islanders. For centuries we have had the benefit of the Christian religion as exemplified by the Roman Catholic Church. With the establishment of American rule, the door was opened to the evangelical faiths. Various communions took advantage of the new field of opportunity for service.

There also developed in the Philippines a Filipino Independent Church, with liberal tendencies. At present, of the 13,000,000 inhabitants of the Philippines, about 4 per cent are pagans, 4 per cent Mohammedans, and 92 per cent Christians. This fact should be a challenge to the Christians in America. Citizens like those who are here gathered should have a very deep interest in the future of my country, for when we shall have been made a republic, independent and free, that Philippine republic will be the first Christian republic in the Far East.

If I may be permitted to make a little personal reference, let me state that I was born and reared in youth a Catholic. My parents and relatives were Catholics. I have since become a Protestant. I have been actively identified with the Y. M. C. A. and with the evangelical churches. I am not very strong for denominationalism. I am strong for the united Christian church movement. I believe that above all denominations is Christianity.

Of course, we can hardly speak of the Christian religion without reference to the Bible, which is the textbook of Christianity. One of the greatest achievements in the field of religion during the last few decades has been the popularization of the Bible in the Philippines and its translation into the vernaculars. This was a necessary sequel to the historic triumph achieved by the Filipinos when they approved the principle of the separation of the church and the state and freedom of religious worship in the constitution which their representatives approved for the short-lived Philippine Republic established in Malolos. Needless to say, this principle was carried out and strengthened during the 30 years of American-Filipino relationship.

It would be presumptuous, in a company of people like you, to discuss the importance of the Bible. I shall merely say that the Filipinos appreciate the Bible as the Book of Books, abounding in wealth, historical, biographical, literary, and religious.

May I not, however, express to you the conviction that the peoples of the world, in these trying and difficult times of distress and depression, are suffering not so much from an economic crisis as from a crisis of faith? Now, of all times, the world has sore need of a restudy and reinterpretation of the Bible to crystallize new life values and to reemphasize life fundamentals; it has great need of a revival of faith.

I have been privileged in my own life experience to witness several movements and events that give cause for belief rather than disbelief. I shall cite just two or three instances. It was my rare fortune to participate at a world gathering held not long since in Toronto, Canada, attended by men and women from all over the world interested in Sunday school and religious education. Then it fell to my lot to head the Philippine delegation to the World Y. M. C. A. convention recently held in Cleveland. When I see gatherings of this sort, when I rub elbows with men and women in various religious conferences, when I meet laymen interested in advancing the frontiers of spirituality, I can not help but admire the heroism, the courage, and, above all, the faith of Christian men and women, Christian leaders, and Christian statesmen.

In the midst of a world crisis men and nations need to be steeped in the crystallized wisdom and idealism of the Bible, for out of such wisdom and idealism must come a chastening of the spirit and a renewal of faith. In a world of constant flux we must be on our guard against those who put the "1" in god and seek to substitute the rule of gold for the reign of God, who alone is unchanging and unalterable, elemental and eternal.

I find joy in associating myself with movements calculated to deepen spirituality and strengthen faith in a world surcharged with the spirit of doubt, suspicion, and intolerance. It is inspiring to know that not only professional religionists but laymen are taking a firm stand for Christianity, seeking to arrest the tidal wave of materialism. It is inspiriting to know that there are movements throughout Christendom, that there are Christian men and women everywhere who are concerning themselves with revitalizing faith.

What a glorious thing it would be if men and nations would subscribe to the platform that there be no moratorium in character preparation, no holiday in moral reparation! The world can ill afford to entertain the possibility of spiritual bankruptcy. But in order to make these ideals and principles living and dynamic forces we must have faith in the validity of ideas, in the primacy of ideals, and in the all-pervading, ever-victorious power of Christ and of God.

In my own particular mission in the United States, that of laboring to secure the independence of my beloved Philippines, there are those who oppose me or discourage me by pointing out the possible risks and dangers. My invariable answer has been and is this: We are aware of the consequences and the difficulties; but we are undaunted, for we have faith. We have faith in ourselves. We have faith in our potentialities. We have faith in the essential goodness of the human race. We have faith in the all-conquering power of the principles enunciated in the Bible, especially the Golden Rule, which has been tested upon the anvil of human experience under all sorts of conditions, in all climes, and for centuries.

The world must be saved from this crisis of faith. Christianity is the way out. There must be a renewal of faith—that faith that can move heaven and earth. Without faith, people stagnate.

SOLDIERS' ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, John Doe was a private soldier during the war. He holds an adjusted-service certificate for $1,000, which is the average; it is dated January 1, 1925, and the $1,000 is payable at death or January 1, 1945. Doe claims the Government owes him $1,000 for adjusted pay at this time and he should therefore not be required to die or wait until 1945 before it is collected. Congress passed a law in 1924 acknowledging that all veterans of the World War were entitled to $1 a day extra pay for home service and $1.25 a day extra pay for service overseas. Doe was entitled to the following:

210 days' home service, at $1 a day extra	$210
200 days' service overseas, at $1.25 a day	250
Total	460

The question is, When was the money due? If it is paid as of 1925, that would be equal to a payment of about 60 or 70 cents as of the time the services were rendered in 1917 and 1918. If the money is paid as of the time the services were rendered and a reasonable interest is calculated from a date representing halfway between the beginning and ending of the emergency period during the war, or June 1, 1918, Doe was entitled to the full $1,000 on October 1, 1931. How much interest should Doe be allowed? For many years the Government caused Doe to pay 6, 7, and 8 per cent interest, compounded annually, for his own money. Therefore, the Government should invoke the same principle for Doe that it has always invoked for others under similar circumstances and pay him at least 6 per cent, compounded annually. The following table represents what he is entitled to:

Table to show the amount of $460 at 6 per cent compounded annually from June 1, 1918, to June 1, 1932, and also the amount as of October 1, 1931

	Interest	Total amount
June 1—
1918		$460.00
1919	$27.60	487.60
1920	29.25	516.85
1921	31.01	547.86
1922	32.87	580.73
1923	34.84	615.57
1924	36.93	652.50
1925	39.15	691.65
1926	41.49	733.14
1927	43.98	777.12
1928	46.62	823.74
1929	49.42	873.16
1930	52.38	925.54
1931	55.53	981.07
1932	58.86	1,039.93
Total	579.93

NOTE.—The amount at October 1, 1931, would be $1,000.69.

Instead of Doe receiving the $460 as of the time the services were rendered he was given an adjusted-service certificate for $1,000. When Doe was discharged he was given $60 for the purpose of purchasing a civilian suit of clothes, he having given his civilian suit to the Red Cross to be sent to Belgium and France to relieve distress there at the time of his entry into the service. This left $400. Congress declared that he should have 25 per cent added to his credit for waiting until January 1, 1945, for his money. This increased his credit by $100, or to $500. Five hundred dollars was a sufficient amount to pay a single premium on $1,000 insurance policy similar to his adjusted-service certificate, and instead of the cash settlement he was given the $1,000 certificate.

WHAT CHANGES ARE TO BE MADE FOR DOE'S BENEFIT

Doe in asking for full payment is merely asking that his certificate be dated back to the time the services were rendered, the interest rated computed as above mentioned, the $60 not to be deducted and the $100 credit for waiting be eliminated.

WHY THE $60 SHOULD NOT HAVE BEEN DEDUCTED

The $60 payment at discharge was given to the soldier who had served only one day and to the general who was drawing $8,000 a year. Neither the 1-day soldier nor the $8,000-a-year general has been required to pay the $60 back to the Government, so why make those who served longer than 60 days pay it back?

SHOULD THE $100 OR 25 PER CENT FOR WAITING BE COLLECTED?

Although the veterans have waited 14 years for their money and the Congress has declared that 25 per cent extra should be added for waiting 20 years, the extra amount is not being asked but is eliminated in arriving at the amount due.

THE CERTIFICATE SHOULD BE DATED JUNE 1, 1918

If the certificate is dated June 1, 1918, which is a date half way between the beginning and ending of the emergency period or November 11, 1918, the date of the armistice, Doe is entitled to the full $1,000 at this time. It is not right to commence the computation of interest seven and one-half years after the services were rendered, or January 1, 1925.

THE WAR PROFITEERS RECEIVED INTEREST FROM 1918

The corporations that profited so much by reason of this country's misery and misfortune during the war received huge settlements for their war services many years after the war was over, and in the form of adjusted pay. Hundreds of millions and billions of dollars were returned to them by the Government. A large part of this money was refunded or given back to them on the theory that the taxpayers did not charge off a sufficient amount for depreciation of their war facilities from 1917–1919.

The United States Steel Corporation, the concern that made a profit of $1,500,000 a day during the war, received a refund of $15,736,595.72 for the year 1918. The refund was made about 11 years after the war and interest at 6 per cent was paid by the Government on this refund. The interest amounted to $10,099,765. The Government allowed the 6 per cent interest on the theory that the taxpayer would have been charged 6 per cent interest on any amount assessed and collected that should have been paid but was not paid in 1918. That is the same principle we are invoking for the veterans. They were charged 6, 7, and 8 per cent interest, compounded annually, for their own money; therefore the Government should not object to paying them the minimum rate of 6 per cent, compounded annually. The Aluminum Co. of America submitted a claim for amortization of war facilities in 1919 for $6,852,697.36. December 1, 1921, or a few months after Mr. Andrew W. Mellon, the principal owner of this company, became Secretary of the Treasury, a supplemental claim was filed for $18,124,339.28. The amount finally granted was $15,589,614.39. Interest on the amount refunded was allowed at the rate of 6 per cent from the year 1918—not from January 1, 1925. We are asking that the same principle be invoked for John Doe.

THE AMOUNT OF MONEY VETERANS IN EACH COUNTY WILL RECEIVE

February 18, 1932, I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement showing how much money the veterans in each county in the United States will receive if the bill to pay the adjusted-service certificates becomes law. It will be found on pages 4289 to 4299 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the above date.

AMENDMENT OF RULES XIII AND XXIV

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, there has been pending a report from the Rules Committee on House Resolution 150, to change the rules for the consideration of bills on the Consent Calendar and the Private Calendar. I think, in view of the fact that it has been pending so long, I shall ask the Speaker to call up the rule at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana calls up a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 150

Resolved, That clause 3 of Rule XIII be amended to read as follows:

"After a bill has been favorably reported and shall be upon either the House or Union Calendar, any Member may file with the Clerk a notice that he desires such bill placed upon a special calendar to be known as the 'Consent Calendar.' On the first and third Mondays of each month, immediately after the reading of the Journal, the Speaker shall direct the Clerk to call the bills in numerical order which have been for three legislative days upon the 'Consent Calendar.' Should objection be made to the consideration of any bill so called, it shall be carried over on the calendar without prejudice to the next day when the 'Consent Calendar' is again called, and if again objected to by three or more Members, it shall immediately be stricken from the calendar, and shall not thereafter during the same session of that Congress be placed again thereon: Provided, That no bill shall be called twice on the same legislative day."

That clause 6 of Rule XXIV be amended to read as follows:

"On Saturday of each week, after the disposal of such business on the Speaker's table as requires reference only, it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar. In the Committee of the Whole House the Chairman shall direct the Clerk to call the bills in numerical order that have been upon the Private Calendar for three legislative days. When the Clerk shall have read the bill the same shall be considered unless objection or reservation of objection is made to immediate consideration. Should objection or reservation of objection be made there shall be 10 minutes' general debate to be divided, 5 minutes controlled by the Member offering the objection or reservation and 5 minutes controlled by the chairman of the committee reporting the bill, or, in his absence, by any Member supporting the bill. If, after such debate, three objections are not forthcoming, the bill shall be considered under the 5-minute rule: Provided, however, That the total debate under the 5-minute rule shall not exceed 20 minutes. After the debate hereinbefore referred to, or when the bill is first called, if objection is made by three Members to the consideration of the bill, then the same shall be passed over and carried to a list designated as 'deferred.' It shall be in order for the bills on the 'deferred list' to have the first call in their numerical order when the Private Calendar is called on the last Saturday of each month. At this time the bills on the 'deferred list' shall be considered under the general rules of the Committee of the Whole House with 10 minutes' general debate to be divided equally, with 5 minutes controlled by the chairman of the committee reporting the bill or other Member supporting the bill and 5 minutes controlled by any Member objecting or opposing the bill. After the debate the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule: Provided, however, That the total debate under the 5-minute rule shall not exceed 20 minutes. If, however, after such consideration the Committee of the Whole House acts on the bill adversely, it shall be laid aside until the committee arises, whereupon it shall be reported back to the House with the adverse recommendation. Any bill under this rule reported back to the House with an adverse recommendation shall automatically be recommitted to the committee reporting it, and said bill shall not again be reported during the same Congress."

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to reach some agreement limiting the time for debate.

Mr. MICHENER. I do not know just what time we will require, but we would like the usual 30 minutes, although it may not be necessary.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Does the gentleman mean 30 minutes on the side?

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; if it should be necessary. I do not think it will be necessary.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I do not think we need that much debate. I will ask unanimous consent that debate be limited to 40 minutes, 20 minutes on the side.

Mr. MICHENER. It is not a question of unanimous consent. The gentleman has one hour. He can yield it as he sees fit. I am asking for the privilege of using 30 minutes of that hour in case we so desire.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has control of the time and is recognized for one hour.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Michigan 30 minutes, which he may use as he desires.

Mr. Speaker, there has been demand for a change in the consideration of the Consent Calendar and the Private Calendar. For two years I have been one of those selected by the floor leader to appear here to consider the bills and offer objection to such bills as should be objected to. With many other Members of the House I have been impressed by the fact that in the consideration of bills on these calendars there has not been proper decorum, proper debate, or proper consideration of the bills on their merits.

The amendment of the rules that is being presented at this time is the result of consideration of several of these propositions and deciding upon rules that would lead to decorum and speedy consideration of bills on these two calendars.

The first part of the resolution deals with the Consent Calendar. It does not change the former rule in any fundamental way. On line 9 of the first amendment to clause 3 of Rule XIII we have inserted the word "numerical," making that clause read "the bills shall be called in numerical order."

This has been the procedure in the past.

That has been the procedure in the past, but the word "numerical" does not appear in the old rule. In the next line, line 10, we have inserted the word "legislative," bills "which have been for three legislative days upon the Consent Calendar." That conforms to the ruling of the Chair that the three days which have heretofore been considered should be legislative days.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. The gentleman has referred to the bills being called in numerical order. Suppose we should get half way down the calendar or two-thirds down the calendar? Would the next call begin where the call left off on that particular day, or would the call start at the beginning of the calendar? If the call should start at the beginning of the calendar each time that would result in certain bills being repeatedly called while those at the end of the calendar would not have that privilege.

Mr. GREENWOOD. That has always been the rule. The rule has been to start at the beginning of the Unanimous Consent Calendar, while on the Private Calendar they have always started at the star. So we are simply following the old rule in that respect.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does the gentleman think it is fair, when there is a long calendar, to permit certain bills to repeatedly have the call while the bills at the end of the calendar will not have any opportunity of call?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Usually the Consent Calendar is not a very long calendar. It is not a long calendar like the Private Calendar. It rarely happens that the Consent Calendar is not called in its entirety.

Mr. JONES. If I may be permitted, as I understand it, under the rule they can only be called twice anyway, and then they go off the calendar?

Mr. BRIGGS. Certain bills can be repeatedly called while other bills at the end of the calendar will not be reached. Usually when an objection is reserved a bill is passed over without prejudice, and it retains its place on the calendar, but under the rule, as proposed, as I understand, certain bills will be repeatedly called.

Mr. JONES. They usually go to the foot of the calendar.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Under the rule as now written, there is no such thing as a bill going over without prejudice, because we provide that when a bill is objected to, it does go over without prejudice. It is different from the old rule in that respect. In line 11 it is provided that—

> Should objection be made to the consideration of any bill so called, it shall be carried over on the calendar without prejudice to the next day when the Consent Calendar is again called, and if again objected to by three or more Members, it shall immediately be stricken from the calendar.

Under the old rule a Member asked that it go over without prejudice. Under this rule, if objection is made, it automatically goes over without prejudice, and it goes off the calendar if three or more objections are made to it. Those are the only changes with reference to the Consent Calendar. The rule provides that if three or more objections are made to a bill it shall be stricken from the calendar and shall not thereafter during the same session of that Congress be placed again thereon, and the rule provides that no bill shall be called twice on the same legislative day.

The second part of the rule changes entirely the rule as formerly written for the Private Calendar. Friday was the day which was provided under the old rule. We are asking now that Saturday be made the day because Saturday is not a general legislative day. We make it in order on every Saturday to call the Private Calendar. This is in order to expedite the business of this calendar, which is constantly growing.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. Does not the gentleman think that Saturday is a very bad day, because usually we adjourn from Friday until Monday? By providing that Saturday shall be the day, you are treating the Private Calendar like an orphan. You are going to make the Private Calendar in order when there may be no possibility of going into it at all.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Very often Friday has been taken for general legislation and the Private Calendar is not called at all, so it was deemed better to make it Saturday, so as to give the Private Calendar a better opportunity to be called. When the Private Calendar is called, ordinarily the only Members present are those who have bills on the calendar or those who have been appointed to look after the consideration of bills. So Saturday is utilized. Every Saturday can be utilized for the Private Calendar, and that will give the Private Calendar a better opportunity to be called than under the old rule.

Mr. BOYLAN. What will be the status if the House adjourns from Friday until Monday? What will happen to Saturday?

Mr. GREENWOOD. That is up to the House. If the House does not want to consider the Private Calendar the procedure will go on as it has in the past. You can not prevent the House from adjourning or recessing if it wants to.

Mr. BOYLAN. I think that is a bad feature. You ought to make it Friday instead of Saturday.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MEAD. Will this prevent the House, by unanimous consent, from setting aside any evening or any other day for the consideration of the Private Calendar?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I do not think so, and I do not so understand it. In changing the rule for the consideration of the Private Calendar we have substituted Saturday of each week, but we do not make it compulsory.

We provide that it is in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar. I think this will give bills on the Private Calendar a better opportunity to be heard. The present rule is vague about this. It sets aside Friday, but Friday is never used. Then the old rule gives certain priority to bills from the Claims Committee and private pension bills, but private pension bills are now included in an omnibus bill, and there is absolutely no attention paid to the wording of the rule in that respect.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. When the gentleman gets through will he yield me 10 minutes on the resolution?

Mr. GREENWOOD. If the gentleman is in opposition to the resolution, I shall grant him 10 minutes or ask the gentleman from Michigan to yield time to the gentleman.

Mr. MICHENER. We are not opposing the resolution.

Mr. GREENWOOD. We will see that the gentleman from Texas has time.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Is there any change in the rule in reference to bills on either the Private Calendar or Union Calendar that may or may not have been objected to, that may come up under the call of a committee?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Bills can always be called up on Calendar Wednesday by the committee that reports them. This simply provides another opportunity.

Mr. GOSS. Referring to the language at the bottom of page 3, when you go into Committee of the Whole House and the bill is reported back adversely, that bill can not again be reported to the Congress. That is not the practice to-day, is it?

Mr. GREENWOOD. It is not intended that this rule shall take the place of the regular Calendar Wednesday. This is to give this particular calendar preference on this day, so that the bills may be called in regular order regardless of the committee from which they come.

Mr. GOSS. And regardless of the calendar they are on?

Mr. GREENWOOD. They will have to be on the Private Calendar in order to be called. No bill on the Union Calendar goes on the Private Calendar.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. As I interpret the rules that have been offered here, there is very little change in the rule governing consideration of the Consent Calendar.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Practically no change.

Mr. PATTERSON. Except inclusion of the word "numerical," which is practically a technical change.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I have already explained that there is practically no change in the rule with reference to the Consent Calendar.

There have been those who believe that when a committee considers a bill, like the Claims Committee or the Military Affairs Committee to correct a military record, there ought to be an opportunity for such bills to be heard on their merits at some time and that no one man or group of three men ought to have the power to dislodge that bill, strike it from the calendar, and send it to a place where it can never again receive a hearing or be considered on its merits.

As I have said, this rule with respect to consideration of the Private Calendar has this in mind. It will obviate the objection I have stated and permit bills to be considered on their merits, even though they are objected to, when the bills are called under this rule. Therefore we have provided that if a person objects to a bill he shall have five minutes in which to explain his objection, and then the chairman of the committee reporting the bill has five minutes in order to discuss the bill upon its merits and show the reason the committee reported the bill favorably. After 10 minutes of orderly debate, 5 minutes for and 5 minutes against, then if the single objector has been able to persuade two other Members to sustain him in his objection the bill is taken off that calendar and goes to the deferred list provided in the rule, and on the last Saturday of the month bills that have been objected to by three objectors and have been placed on the deferred list are brought up in numerical order and considered upon their merits. The House then has the opportunity of disposing of the bill finally upon its merits.

This is fair to the committee reporting the bill. The committees, like the Committee on Claims and the Committee on Military Affairs, appoint subcommittees, and they go into the evidence before reporting the bill, and it seems to me it is not treating the committee fairly and it is not proper deliberation by a legislative body to allow one man to lodge an objection and send a bill off the calendar, where it will never again, perhaps, receive a hearing.

The Federal Government is constantly going into new activities. There are a thousand agencies of the Federal Government in our land to-day with Government trucks and airplanes, and so forth, that are maiming people by carelessness and negligence, and even destroying life, and there is no opportunity in the Federal courts to present a tort case. There may be actions brought on contracts in the Court of Claims, but the only place claimants have to seek redress or to secure justice in matters of tort is the Claims Committee of this House. To have the Claims Committee report a bill favorably and then have it dislodged by one objector seems to me entirely unjust.

This rule is written with the idea of allowing the person who has a private bill to have his day in court and have it disposed of on its merits. [Applause.]

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Is this a unanimous report of the committee, or was there a minority report?

Mr. GREENWOOD. It is a unanimous report. There was not a single objection in the Rules Committee. Furthermore, we know that when bills have come up in the past a Member has reserved an objection, and he rises and discusses that objection, then some one else interposes, and then a group begins an argument, and the general membership of the House does not know anything about the discussion that is going on. This rule provides for orderly debate of five minutes for the one who reserves the objection and five minutes for the one in support of the bill. Then, after the one who has objected, if he secures two or three other objectors to vote with him, the bill goes off to the deferred list. That is the way these bills are to be handled. Now, if there are any questions, I will be glad to answer.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. I take it that this change in the rule, this provision, is somewhat equivalent to what we have on Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Only certain bills can go upon this list. Bills on the Union Calendar or on the House Calendar can not go on the Private Calendar. It must be a private bill, whether from the Committee on Military Affairs, or the Claims Committee, or any other committee; they go on regardless of the committee, and are taken up in numerical order.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. This is to shear the professional objectors of some of their power?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Not altogether.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. With one man tying the whole thing up?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Well, they are entirely within their rights.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. They have too much rights. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREENWOOD. In giving them their rights, the House ought to be the tribunal to determine the questions on the merits of the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. It is to prevent one man controlling 435.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, during the last few years there has grown up a demand for the liberalization of the so-called unanimous-consent and Private Calendar rules. This demand was so insistent that before the Congress convened the Republicans held a conference at which consideration was given to the proposed changes. The Republican conference directed the Republican members of the Rules Committee to submit to the House the proposed changes as suggested by the conference.

That was done. The suggestions were referred to the regular Rules Committee, and the so-called Crisp amendments were also submitted to the Rules Committee.

After consideration and study the rule that is now before the House has been reported by the Rules Committee. While it is not exactly in harmony with the proposed Republican rule, neither is it in exact harmony with the proposed Democratic rule; but it is a liberalization of the existing rule, and on the whole I think complies in a general way with what the House wanted. Personally, I happen to be one of those who did not favor much liberalization in these particular rules; but, yielding to the majority of the membership of the House, I shall not oppose but shall support the rule.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, eight years ago I shared with a few other Members of the House in discussing before the Committee on Rules the matter of the Consent Calendar. Our argument led to the requirement that there should be three objectors upon the second day the calendar is called. My recollection is that at that time I suggested five objectors upon the second day; and had that been looked upon with favor by the Committee on Rules, I am inclined to think it might have been a gain; but I accept the situation and am pleased to see that the procedure is to be improved after the fashion presented by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

I would speak particularly, however, of the change in the matter of the Private Calendar. Eight years ago I gave some thought to the possibility of rearranging the program of the House so that we might be sure of a Saturday off in every week of the session, but since then the growth of business has continued, and year after year we find more burdens upon our shoulders, so that it is altogether probable we shall be unable to have a full Saturday to ourselves regularly unless we open our eyes to the situation in the matter of little measures. For the time being anyhow, I see no way of escape from obligation for almost continuous week-day attendance save that now suggested by the Committee on Rules, which permits Saturdays to be used for business that interests and concerns only a small part of the membership. Of course, in theory there ought to be no business here which does not demand a full attendance; but, as a matter of fact, the Private Calendar can be just as well handled by a small part of the Members as by the full membership. This jury of 40 or 50 is likely to reach just as accurate and wise conclusions as if the 435 were present. Therefore, if we devote Saturdays to this class of business that calls for but a few of us to be on hand, it seems to me that there can be no injury to the public welfare.

I take this opportunity to call to the attention of the House the fact that in the calendar at this moment there are 30 pages of private bills, almost 600 cases where a committee has believed that the justice or the equity of the Nation ought to be dispensed, involving nearly 600 citizens of the United States who believe they have been wronged. In so far as partnerships or corporations are concerned, of course the total of the individuals' interest is larger. Here are at least 600 instances where our committees have said that justice or equity ought not to be denied. This thing is growing in most astonishing degree. So far as my observation goes, never before has there been a calendar with 30 pages devoted to these neglected claims. My colleague, Mr. UNDERHILL, of Massachusetts, serving on the Committee on Claims, feeling the gross wrong of the present situation, secured by the exercise of many hours and days of labor the passage of a bill through the House and through the Senate that would to some degree have lessened what I can not help calling this disgrace to the Congress of the United States. When his bill reached the Executive chamber, unfortunately something in the way of constitutional or technical objection appeared, and the President felt constrained not to sign the bill. Therefore, no progress was made.

Mr. Speaker, new brooms sweep clean. Now that the control of the House has gone to the party which through a dozen years did not have the power to remedy this situation, I wish it might awake to its opportunity and see if it can not secure the reform so greatly needed under which the decision on small claims shall be left to the departments and the decision on larger claims shall be turned over to the Court of Claims, in order that we may be relieved of a duty burdensome in itself, a duty that no legislative body is fitted to perform, because of all instrumentalities that mankind has yet devised none is worse for the dispensing of either justice or equity than a legislative assembly.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. HARLAN. Is the gentleman aware that there has been passed by a subcommittee, and is now pending before the Committee on Claims in the House and also in the Senate, a bill to carry out the very provisions the gentleman just referred to, to allow the departments to settle minor claims and to refer larger claims to the Court of Claims?

Mr. LUCE. I am thankful to be informed of that. I did not know it. I wish Godspeed to that bill, and I hope he can avoid the pitfalls which previous attempts have met with, and I assure the gentleman I shall be delighted to contribute what little I can to its passage.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. I believe that when considering a bill of that nature in the past, the other body which talks about economy did not want these private claims tried in another tribunal, because for political purposes they desired to be the jury and the judge themselves. They do not practice their 10 per cent general economy reductions when it comes to spending the taxpayers' money with reference to such meritorious legislation.

Mr. LUCE. Once, nevertheless, we were able to get such a bill to the White House, and I recall the copy book maxim, "If at first you don't succeed, try, try again."

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORTON D. HULL].

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to say what was said by the gentleman from Massachusetts—that if the difficulty arises out of a tort case, and there is inability to give proper consideration to tort cases, and there is no right on the part of any other tribunal to settle those cases, it seems to me the imperative thing is to pass some act of general character that will permit of the proper trial of these cases before a proper tribunal and not before a legislative body. This proposition of having 10 minutes for a private claim, whether it involves a large amount or a small amount, does not seem to me to be the proper thing.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. Can not that time be extended by unanimous consent in the event more time is necessary?

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Does the gentleman mean under this rule?

Mr. KVALE. Yes.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. I do not know whether it could or not. I would not undertake to answer that question.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I would not have the approval of my conscience if I allowed a rule like this to pass at this time without a word of protest.

I realize that with just 60 Members present there is not a chance in the world to stop it. If I had one hour to speak against it, I could not stop it, as our colleagues have determined that they are going to have a rule making it easy to pass their private bills; but I want to register this protest.

For 15 years back I have fought a bill that is over a hundred years old, and helped to kill it thus far. It is the old Sevier heirs' claim against the Government. It was for over $100,000,000, counting the claim for interest.

I once saw a Committee on Claims when I first came here take up that bill one morning, and after 15 minutes' consideration, with 21 members of the committee present, pass that bill; and I was the only Member who voted against it. It was thus favorably reported out practically unanimously. By digging up the records down in the department and showing that old Governor Sevier had received everything that was due him from the Government and that they had his signed receipts down there, we finally stopped that bill. But it is still in expectancy. They are still hoping some day to get it through the committee. If a few of us who have been fighting it should happen to die off, they will get it introduced again; and that 100-year old, $100,000,000, unmeritorious bill will come up under this new rule and there will be 10 minutes' debate—five minutes on each side. How can a Member convince his colleagues in five minutes that that $100,000,000 claim is unjust? It can not be done. The bill will pass. And another hundred million dollars of the people's money will be unjustly taken out of the Treasury.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. I only have 10 minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER. This bill was not considered by the present Committee on Claims.

Mr. BLANTON. No; it was not. They are not going to bring it up any more as long as a few of us are here who know all about it and who under the present rules could stop it, but they will bring it up again some day after we pass this proposed rule that will make its passage easy.

I would like to remind my friend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] of what one of his distinguished colleagues once said at that table. I refer to our former colleague from Massachusetts, Hon. Joe Walsh, who now adorns the Superior Court of Massachusetts. The gentleman will remember one night, when such private bills were being passed in bunches, almost faster than you could say "without objection, this bill is considered to have been read a third time, and is passed, and a motion to reconsider is laid on the table," the gentleman heard Joe Walsh get up at that table and say, "You might as well take the hinges off the doors of the Treasury and throw the doors away, because you have passed so many bills to-night that we can not stop the public money from being taken out and given away."

Under such a rule as this we can not stop any bad bills. You will find that Members who have been working to save the money of the people will give up in disgust and quit doing the hard, grinding work that is necessary to stop them, and they will say, "Just let them all pass."

On this private bill day Saturday, who will be here? A few Members who have claims? Who else will be here? Who else is here this afternoon when this important rule is being passed and is about to be passed? Our friends who have bills on the Private Calendar are all interested in this rule. How will you get them to object to a bill?

Policy will keep them from it. Naturally they know that if they are one of the three who object to a bill that when one of their bills is called Members whose bills have been objected to will be resentful and will object to their bills.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman indicated that the House could not consider some of these small claims bills in 10 minutes. Is it not a fact that within the last few days the House considered and passed the $45,000,000 Interior appropriation bill with 20 minutes allotted to those in favor of the bill and 20 minutes to those in opposition?

Mr. BLANTON. I want the gentleman to get that out of his system. I have seen him sit here and have crammed down his throat by his Republican organization bill after bill of importance. I have seen him stand up to the lick log and vote on important measures with only 20 minutes' debate.

The gentleman sits over here and he is getting some of his own medicine. When it is important to pass a measure, and pass it now, the Democrats know how to function. Those amendments reduced appropriations, and were approved by practically the entire membership, hence we acted under a suspension of rules.

But, Mr. Speaker, I am about through. I wanted to register my protest against this rule. I want to predict that under this rule it will be absolutely impossible to stop many bad bills. The Consent Calendar part of the rule is good. I have no objection to the provision of the bill with regard to the Consent Calendar; it is all right; but with respect to the Private Calendar there could be collusion, and you see that here once in a while. You saw the gentleman from Minnesota claim the time in opposition to such an important measure as the Philippine independence bill, and then you saw him vote for it. After he had controlled the time against the bill, he voted for it. You could have such collusion under this rule when the real opposition to a bill could not get recognition and could not get any time to give their views on it.

But I will not require a quorum. I will sit here and watch you pass a rule that will take the money out of the Treasury, because you would pass it anyway on Monday when a quorum is present, so I will not delay matters. I will watch for more deficits in the Treasury. If you keep it up, you never will balance the Budget. This is a very unwise rule you are passing. That is all I have to say.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG.]

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I have served for eight years on the War Claims Committee of this House. I have seen the several subcommittees of our committee hold hearings and spend a great amount of time carefully preparing a report favoring a bill, only to have the bill objected to when called on the calendar. I have gone to the objector and asked if he would withhold his objection, but the reply was, "No; I am against that." The result is a lot of hard work thrown away because some Member's supper has not agreed, or because some other Member had objected to his bill.

I looked into this practice at one time. I found that it originated about this way: A man now passed from us, who spent a great deal of time going into this Private Calendar, used to rise, reserve the right to object, and then cross-examine the man who had the bill in charge. If after that cross-examination he thought the bill was good, he withdrew his objection; but if he thought the bill was bad, he insisted upon his objection. This man passed on. During the time he was in this House, he trained a good woman to go over the bills on these calendars and make a synopsis of the reports on the bills and paste it upon the bill. Then there came on a lot of objectors appointed by the management of both sides of the House. They got these bills with a synopsis prepared by this good woman telling what the bill contained.

I found that if the report was carefully prepared she only gave the facts; but if somebody made a mistake, or if somebody failed to elaborate upon the report, she said it was objected to by the War Department, and down the bill went. These men gathered the approbation of the House under the idea that they had gone into these bills, that they had studied them; but not at all. All they had was this memorandum taken from the report and pasted on the bill.

Talk about collusion. I have seen bills that required three objections. One Member would go to another and say, "Will you object?" "Yes." "Will you object?" "Yes." Then they would turn down a bill without a particle of consideration by this House, a bill that had been passed upon by a committee which had studied the facts.

I do not want you to believe that I desire to pass all the bills that come to the committee. I have a pretty good record. During the last few years in every session of Congress bills calling for over $200,000,000 have come to my committee, but never in any session of Congress did that committee report but a little over 2 per cent of the bills that came to it. We beat the Volstead Act. We reported out less than one-half of 1 per cent, and yet these objectors have tried to lead the House to believe that we were trying to pass unjust bills.

I think the people of the United States who have claims against the Government have the right to have them considered somewhere and have the right to have somebody consider the facts. After a committee has done so and made a favorable report, certainly the Members of this body should give the report of their committees proper consideration.

I hope this resolution will be adopted.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER].

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, one listening to the talk of the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] would reach a conclusion that the standing committees of this House report out bills on the Private Calendar without any consideration whatever. I have been a member of the Claims Committee for a number of years, and I assure the Members who are going to vote on this resolution that when a bill is referred to the Claims Committee the first thing that happens is to have the department make a report upon the bill, and evidence is required to be submitted by the author of said bill. The bill is then referred to a subcommittee, which carefully considers the entire facts, the equities and legal principles involved. Then the subcommittee makes a report to the full committee on the regular committee meeting day. The individual members of the full committee carefully consider the report of the subcommittee; and if any of you believe, after hearing the gentleman from Texas talk, that these private bills are not considered in the Claims Committee, I would suggest that you come into the Claims Committee meeting some Friday. If you do that, you will find the gentleman from Texas has given you some unreliable argument.

Although the gentleman from Texas tries to picture himself as the only man in this House who stands between the ruining of the taxpayers' Treasury, let me say that a private claims bill is fully considered by a subcommittee, then considered by the full committee, and if a favorable report is made on a bill by the unanimous vote of the full committee the entire membership of the House should have an opportunity to consider it on the floor of the House as provided in the pending measures. Such a bill should not fail to be considered because one Member, even though he be from the great State of Texas and is the self-styled Member who stands alone as guardian over the taxpayers' Treasury, objects to its consideration.

Is that justice? Is that liberalization of the rules that the Democrats have talked about and the Republicans have talked about? I guess it is not.

You do not vote for any unwarranted raids on the Treasury if you pass this resolution, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas, who voted to suspend the rules on the $45,000,000 Interior Department appropriation bill, with 186 Senate amendments in it, where the opposition had only 20 minutes to oppose it and where those in favor of the motion had only 20 minutes in which to present their case. And yet the gentleman from Texas comes before us and says you should not consider a bill on the Private Calendar which involves $2,000 or $43, as some of them do, in 10 minutes, after the Claims Committee has reported it by a unanimous vote.

I hope this resolution will be passed, the objections of the conscientious objector from the State of Texas to the contrary notwithstanding. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield to me to ask a question of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin, if his logic is correct, why he does not suggest that as soon as the Claims Committee reports a bill it be ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table? If the action of the committee is so perfect and reliable, why have Congress look it over at all? Why not let the committee pass all bills?

Mr. SCHAFER. That is an indefensible argument by a man who is confronted with the fact that his speech was wrong, because when a bill has been favorably reported by a committee after careful consideration, under the proposed rule the Members will have a committee report and have an opportunity to vote intelligently after 10 minutes' discussion, which can be extended by unanimous consent.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the fact that I do not agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] on some of the matters, there is no one here who can deny that he has been of great service in many instances to the people of his State and to the people of the Nation. [Applause.] That he is absolutely wrong, however, on the question of prohibition is generally known and recognized, but we are still hopeful that we may be able to have him realize that he has been mistaken, and that he will, in the near future, come and vote with us for the modification of the Volstead Act, for which the country has long been clamoring.

As to this resolution, I think it is legislation in the right direction, and I am mighty glad to see some gentlemen on the other side rise and say that they have been in favor of and have advocated the liberalization of the rules.

Of course the Republicans have been in control for many years. They have had a number of opportunities to bring in such a rule but have failed, yes, have refused, to do anything to liberalize the rules; and it remained for us Democrats to do so.

This rule is in the interest of procedure that will be helpful and beneficial; but, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the bill, which provided that these small private bills be handled by a bureau instead of by Congress, that has been passed by Congress and vetoed by the President will be passed again in such an amended form that it will be embarrassing for President Hoover to veto it. But, Mr. Speaker, if the President should again veto it, I am satisfied that in the near future, yes, in the next Congress, we shall have a Democratic President, who will not veto any such meritorious measure that tends; yes; will help the House to legislate more efficiently. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. LUCE. Will the gentleman withhold that a moment so that I may submit a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I withhold it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, on page 2, line 2, the second word "again" being superfluous and confusing the meaning, I think the gentleman from Indiana will not object to my asking unanimous consent that the second "again" in line 2 of page 2 be stricken out.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have discussed that matter with the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I agree with him.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. KNIFFIN, from April 25 to April 28, on account of official business.

To Mr. FERNANDEZ, for April 25 and 26, on account of official business.

FEDERAL ESTATE TAX

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject of the Federal estate tax.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, I read a copy of a letter to an Indiana gentleman who was misled by misrepresentations appearing in a front-page editorial of the Chicago Journal of Commerce, dated April 9, 1932, and entitled "Soak-the-Rich Taxes and Your Job." This article urged the defeat of 98 Middle-West Congressmen, mentioned by name, who recently voted for the pending revenue bill, which included the estate-tax increase under the Ramseyer amendment. These 98, by the way, included the entire Indiana delegation of both parties.

The letter follows:

APRIL 19, 1932.

Mr. C. W. MARTIN,
American Zinc Products Co., Greencastle, Ind.

DEAR MR. MARTIN: I appreciate your letter inclosing editorial clipping from the Chicago Journal of Commerce of April 9, with reference to the Federal estate tax. Nevertheless I disagree with your letter and the views expressed by Mr. Hanna. One of the chief difficulties in this country to-day has been the tremendous concentration of wealth in a few hands, which has taken purchasing power out of the consumer classes, which in turn is affecting your business and every other business in the country. If mass production in modern civilization is to go on, it can do so only by the wider diffusion of wealth and not from its concentration. Mass production means mass consumption. There must be wealth in the hands of the consumers to exchange for wealth in the hands of producers. Otherwise there is no exchange. There is stagnation. And producers suffer along with consumers. Think this over.

Mr. Hanna's editorial is misleading in at least the following respects:

First, that estate taxes were raised from 20 per cent to 45 per cent, and that in case of death it is "necessary immediately for the estate of that owner to raise 45 per cent of the value of the estate for the Federal inheritance tax."

This is as false as it can be. The 45 per cent applies only to the higher brackets. The total tax to the total estate would be a much smaller percentage in any case. In no case would it be necessary for the owner to raise 45 per cent of the value of the estate to pay the tax. The 45 per cent rate applies only on the excess over $10,000,000. This is always on the "net" estate, after first deducting $50,000 which is not taxed at all, and also after deducting all debts. The creditors whom Mr. Hanna worries about are all paid before the Government gets a penny.

He also states that unless a million-dollar estate can raise $450,000 "in a hurry" the property must go under the hammer. This contains two false statements. First: There is no $450,000. A million-dollar estate would pay a Federal tax of only $126,000. As against $450,000, Mr. Hanna is wrong by $324,000. This is a poor batting average for a gentleman who criticizes, and by his misstatement leads you to criticize, 98 Middle-West Congressmen who did know what they were voting for. The highest per cent that a million-dollar estate runs into is only 17 per cent, and this applies only on the bracket between $800,000 and $1,000,000; second, there is no hurry about it. Ample time is given under the law and the regulations for an orderly liquidation of the tax. Any executor can make a showing and ask for additional time, and it will be granted to him. If sufficient time is not granted, I certainly would be in favor of giving whatever time is necessary, so that the property need not be sacrificed "under the hammer" for the purpose of providing money to pay the tax. Further, as you know, the owners of large properties which might be affected by estate taxation are protecting themselves by life insurance, so that a fund will be available to pay the tax without either selling or mortgaging the property.

Furthermore, Mr. Hanna's article is misleading in that it implies that in the average case one single individual owns a factory or office building or business, and that the factory or office building would have to be sold to pay the tax. The truth of the matter is, as you know, that with few exceptions, all large business enterprises are corporately owned. There are few of the larger businesses of this country which would run into the 45 per cent rate in which one individual owns as much as 10 per cent of its stock. It is the stock that is sold, if anything is sold, to provide funds to pay the tax, and not the factory or railroad. There is no way in which the Government could levy against the factory when it is corporately owned. We have stock exchanges for selling the stock, and it would very rarely happen that the Federal Government could levy upon a physical property for the purpose of enforcing payment of Federal estate taxes in an estate that would run into the 45 per cent bracket.

I am sending copy of this letter to Mr. Hanna. In justice to 98 Congressmen whom he has misrepresented, he ought to publish it with the same prominence as his editorial.

Sincerely yours,

SAMUEL B. PETTENGILL, M. C.

In addition to replying to the editorial, I wish to briefly mention three additional points with reference to taxing inheritances.

ALLEGED CONFISCATION

It is for the sound discretion of the legislative body to determine the rate of inheritances taxation. As a matter of sound policy rates should not be so high as to discourage thrift and the saving of sums sufficient for one's old age or for the support of children or to dissipate capital invested in socially useful enterprise. Confiscation, however, does not exist in any legal sense, regardless of the rate. It has been repeatedly decided by the courts that the right to inherit, on the part of heirs, or the right to bequeath, on the part of the testator, are not natural rights, but are rights or privileges conferred by the State, as against its right or power to take to itself the entire estate of a deceased person. As I understand the law, there are no legal reasons to prevent the State from taxing inheritances up to 100 per cent, however unwise and harmful such legislation would be. I mention these decisions of the courts to defend them in part, at least, from the charge that they are often too tender to "vested interests."

SOCIAL INJUSTICE OF INHERITANCE TAXATION

I would not say that there are not exceptions, but generally the accumulation of an estate which runs into the 45 per cent bracket depends upon other factors than the foresight, invention, thrift, enterprise, or ability of the owner. These factors are often some privilege conferred by the State upon the accumulator, such as patents and copyrights, tariffs, subsidies, monopolies, or the unearned increment of land values. Other factors may go to means and methods which can not stand before the bar of conscience or square with the golden rule. Krueger, the European match king, who acumulated a colossal fortune, seems to illustrate all three factors, undoubted business ability, a privilege conferrred upon him by the State by way of patent protection, and finally, according to press reports, unscrupulous business methods. As far back as 1892, Andrew Carnegie, in speeches, as well as in his books, the Gospel of Wealth and My Partners the People, preached the social justice of inheritance taxation and the trusteeship of wealth. He said at that time:

> We must let the worker alone during his life, but after his death the State should step in and demand its share of his hoard, through a graduated system of taxation. Every fortune left by a hoarder should contribute to the State in proportion to its size, small amounts left to those dependent upon the decedent being exempt, but the scale rising by steps until with enormous fortunes reaching into many millions it should be decreed that "one-half goes to the privy coffers of the State."

I might add that the rates of the present bill do not reach the figure advocated by Andrew Carnegie 40 years ago, nor the rates that prevail in England to-day.

THAT IT IS ALIEN TO AMERICAN TRADITIONS

Inheritance taxation may be imposed for either one or both of the following motives—to obtain revenue, or to redistribute wealth. Even when imposed for the first reason, the result of the second follows in every case to a greater or less degree, depending upon the rate of tax. As an application of this latter motive, inheritance taxation, far from being alien to our traditions, is in strict conformance therewith. Anglo-Saxon civilization has felt for centuries that the accumulation of enormous wealth in a few hands is opposed to the "general welfare" and the common weal of society. Again and again for hundreds of years laws have been passed or court decisions rendered to break up great estates and to free the living generations from the "dead hand" of the past. For example, there are the various statutes against mortmain (Statute of Monopolies, 21 James I, ch. 3; Statute de Religiosis, 7 Edward I, A. D. 1279; the Act of 13 Edward I, ch. 32, A. D. 1285; the Act of 15 Richard II, ch. 5, A. D. 1391; the Act of 9 George II, ch. 36, A. D. 1736, all designed chiefly to "prevent undue accumulation of wealth in the hands of corporations"); the abolition of primogeniture, under which the eldest son took the entire landed estate, the repeal of entail, under which land could not be sold but descended indefinitely to the blood heirs of the original ancestor, the rule against perpetuities (Duke of Norfolk's case, A. D. 1685), under which trust funds might accumulate indefinitely, and so forth.

These were all designed to prevent the concentration of great fortunes, and to redistribute them after they were accumulated. They did not even have the motive of obtaining public revenue. They were passed under the broad police powers of the State, to promote the "general welfare" of a great people. If they had not been passed, who will be so bold as to say that we would have had, either in England or America, the greatest social advancement, with more happiness to the greatest number of people, of any civilization that the centuries have produced? Inheritance taxation, within fair and reasonable limits, whether for revenue, or to redistribute great fortunes, is not alien to our civilization. It is indigenous to it. It is as truly a part of our tradition as Magna Charta or Concord Bridge.

AGRICULTURE'S TAX BURDEN

Mr. BUCKBEE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to incorporate therein a statement by former Gov. Frank O. Lowden on the economic and agricultural situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCKBEE. Mr. Speaker, under unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD I print an address entitled "Agriculture's Tax Problem," an address by former Governor of Illinois, Hon. Frank O. Lowden. The address which follows was delivered by Governor Lowden at the thirteenth annual meeting of the American Farm Bureau Federation, Chicago, Ill., Wednesday, December 9, 1931:

Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, it is a pleasure and a privilege to appear before you again. Taxation, the subject which you are considering to-day, is engaging the attention of all classes more than ever before in our history, I think. Two years ago I discussed at length before you some methods of taxation, which I thought then, and think now, must be substituted for the general property tax. That method of taxation has become so burdensome, particularly upon farm lands, that it has reached the point of confiscation. In many portions of the United States, lands, to an alarming extent, are being forfeited to the State for nonpayment of taxes.

A few years ago the Bureau of Agricultural Economics in the Department of Agriculture at Washington stated that on the average "taxes take about 30 per cent of the net income of farmers." The percentage must be considerably larger now. We then have this situation: The farming population is, in round numbers, about 25 per cent of our entire population. It receives but about 10 per cent of our national income. It pays 30 per cent of this income in taxes. The other 75 per cent of our population receives about 90 per cent of the total income and pays on an average about 10 per cent of its income in taxes. How long can this glaring inequality go on without ruin to agriculture?

I shall not now, however, repeat what I then said upon that phase of the question. I wish at this time to take occasion to point out how, in my opinion, taxes can be greatly reduced by a simplification and reorganization of local government, particularly in the rural regions. For, after all, by far the largest portion of our tax bill is for local taxes. Indeed, the expenditures of local government for the country as a whole exceed the total expenditures of both the Federal and State Governments.

We are all interested in the Federal Government. We give a good deal of thought to our State government. Our cities are more and more engaging the attention of the citizen. In the realm of county government and town government, however, it is only in recent years that students of political science or the people generally have felt any concern. And yet it is precisely these governments which affect the lives of the country population most frequently and most intimately. It is to support these governments that the larger part of our taxes go. It is to these governments that we look largely for our protection. It is upon these governments that we depend for the maintenance of our poor, for the custody of our petty evildoers and those awaiting trial charged with more serious crimes. It is these governments which administer our schools. It is they, too, which in a large measure build and maintain our roads and construct other local public works. Other important functions also rest upon the county and town governments. No student of the situation contends, I think, that these bodies, under present conditions, are either economic or efficient.

For the protection of our lives and property we have within the same jurisdiction a number of courts, each absolutely independent of the others, with questions of jurisdiction constantly arising. We have justices of the peace. We have probate courts. We have county courts. We have courts of general jurisdiction. Courts in these days have much to do with even purely administrative affairs. It is not conceivable that they can function simply, inexpensively, and effectively as they are now constituted. Isn't it possible to substitute for these divers courts a single unified court for the county? We should, many think, merge all the powers which these different courts now have into a single court. Such court could be in continuous session. The citizen of the county who had occasion to resort to a court would not have to consult a lawyer before he could know to which court to apply. Instead of being obliged to employ a set of subordinate officials for each of the courts, one set of these officials would answer all the needs of the consolidated court, these minor officials to be appointed by the court and not elected at the polls.

Our county jails have been a disgrace to our country for more than a hundred years. One eminent writer says that to find a parallel it is necessary to go back to Turkey and the thirteenth century. Our county almshouses have been a reproach to our civilization since they were first established. This is not the fault of the officials, who, in the main, are humane and considerate men. It is the system which is to blame. The inmates of the county jails and the inmates of the almshouses are too few in number for modern or humane or economical administration of either. They should be abolished altogether, and in their place should come either regional or State institutions.

In some parts of New England, we are told, where the State has partially relieved the counties of the care of the poor, they are more comfortably housed and better cared for at less than half the cost than where the counties perform this function. Virginia recently has substituted for the county almshouse 10 for the entire State. We are told that the inmates are better cared for than ever before, with an average cost per capita of but little above one-half of the original cost.

With reference to the schools, the State has been compelled to exercise an ever-widening supervision over the local authorities.

As to roads also, the State has found it essential to extend its authority in a measure over the local governments. In Illinois, for instance, the county board is required to certify to the State authorities a list of applicants for the position of superintendent of roads. The State conducts an examination and certifies to the county board those who have successfully passed the examination, with their ratings, and the board must appoint one of these.

The State, too, has gradually come to exercise some sort of authority over the public-health administration.

It is evident, then, I think, that the county no longer functions as a successful government.

How, then, you ask, did this form of government come about? Were our fathers so much less wise than we that they devised wholly inadequate units of government? By no means. When counties were first established they met the needs of the times. The functions performed by the county were simple and few. They were chiefly concerned with the administration of justice and an official record of title deeds. In the early stages of the counties even education was a private matter, and there were no public schools. Road construction was simple and largely a township matter. Transportation was slow and difficult. Hence the county must not be so large that all the residents could not reach the county seat with reasonable convenience. The county, therefore, as thus established, while admirably suited to those earlier conditions, is wholly unsuited to those of the present day. For now the county seat, for all practical purposes, is as accessible to the remotest resident as the nearest district school was a century ago. It is significant that the counties in the far West which were last laid out are the largest in the United States.

Not only was the county small geographically to meet the needs of its time, but a genuine organized government seemed unnecessary because of the few and simple functions which it then performed. There must be some authority to levy taxes. Therefore county boards of supervisors or commissioners were formed. These boards exercised the only general administrative powers which the county possessed. For the few definite functions of the county, officers were selected generally by popular election. It was necessary to preserve the records of the courts. Since the courts of general jurisdiction usually covered several counties, a clerk of court was elected in each county within the district or circuit.

The judgments of the court within the county were of no avail unless there was some one to execute them. To accomplish this and to preserve order sheriffs were elected. It was important to preserve the registration of land titles. A separate officer was usually elected to perform this task. A custodian of the public funds was required for the safe-keeping of the county's moneys. A treasurer was elected to perform this duty. In the early days of the county, generally speaking, this is all there was to the county government. It worked fairly well. The county was, in fact, but little more than a political subdivision of the State.

How different the present picture! Within the space of a hundred years the county government has undergone a complete transformation. As the county gradually took on new functions and its accounts became larger and more complicated it seemed desirable to have an auditor of accounts. To fill this place another citizen of the county was elected by popular vote. Public schools have taken the place of private schools. The county has been compelled to undertake the administration of these schools. To this end an elective county superintendent has been added to the list of county officers. The public health, with an advancing civilization, has become an important concern of government. The county, therefore, has been obliged to undertake the administration of a county public health service. How inefficiently this duty has been performed is shown by the fact that the mortality of the country districts is greater than in metropolitan areas, though the reverse should be the fact.

Public highways have become one of the most important of all public functions, involving a much larger expenditure than any other except schools. The county has had to grapple with this problem, too. In most cases it has chosen a superintendent of highways.

In the average county of Illinois—and this is true of most of the States—the salaries of county officials absorb a very large percentage of the total revenues of the county, running as high as 50 per cent. That these officials could serve a much larger territory in most instances no one who is familiar with the situation can for a moment doubt. The county judge is but one instance of this. Even in the smallest county of this State he receives a salary of $1,800 a year, while as a matter of fact his actual official duties can be performed in an insignificant portion of his time. And the constitution of Illinois expressly authorizes the formation of two or more counties into districts for the discharge of this function of government.

I realize the practical difficulty in effecting the consolidation of counties. Without such consolidation, however, contiguous counties to a large extent can be united to administer revenue, schools, highways, health, charities, and other subjects of State concern.

It is a matter of common observation that we have too many public officials. We hear of unemployment everywhere except among public officials. Their number goes on increasing in good and evil times alike.

It is readily seen how greatly the functions of the county government have been enlarged. And yet the machinery for handling these larger functions has in principle remained unchanged. In the realm of State government revolutionary changes have been effected in recent years. There, too, until recently, the larger and more complex duties of the State were performed through scattered, uncoordinated, and independent boards, commissions, and officials. In the most progressive States there has been substituted a unified, cohesive, and responsible government with the governor actually at its head. This has resulted in economy and, above all, in increased efficiency. In the cities likewise there have been noteworthy reforms in recent years. There, too, the trend has been toward a more unified and therefore better coordinated government.

Rural government, however, has been largely untouched by this modernizing movement. It seems appropriate, therefore, to inquire into the principles upon which State and city governments have been organized and to see if these principles can not be made to apply to county government.

No organization of any kind is possible without an actual head. We recognize this fact in every other human institution except in rural government. No business or civic or charitable organization would long survive without a chief executive. In the realm of National and State and Municipal Government we recognized this principle in the beginning. At the head of our Federal Government we placed a President. For the head of our State governments we provided for a governor. In our municipalities a mayor was elected. For our county government, however, we never have had a head. As I have pointed out, this practice was unnecessary in the simpler days when the county was hardly more than a political unit of the State. With the new duties, however, assumed by the county there is the same need for an executive head here that there is elsewhere. Efficiency and economy are idle dreams without a strong directing hand at the head of any enterprise, whether private or public.

The executive budget has come to be regarded as indispensable to an economical government. An executive budget, however, is an impossibility unless there be a chief executive to make it.

If experience has proven anything, it has disclosed that an individual and not a board or commission can alone administer affairs successfully. It is true too that only by conferring power upon the individual official and not upon a board can responsibility be fixed for the nonperformance of duty. The county board, therefore, which is the only authority with anything like a semblance of control over the county government, is wholly inadequate to the task. The situation is made worse, however, for the reason that the control of the county board is only nominal. As we have seen, there is a very considerable list of elected officials with definite administrative duties assigned to them. These officials are independent of one another and in a large measure even of the county board.

Since at least the middle of the last century until quite recently the tendency has been toward elective rather than appointive officers. This was thought to be in pursuance of the democratic ideal of government. It was supposed that the way to cure the ills of democracy was more democracy. Instead, however, of this being the fact this disposition to elect more and more public officials tended to defeat the very underlying purposes of democracy. For democracy means control by the people of its own governmental affairs. The people can control their own affairs only if they can definitely locate responsibility. This is impossible where the powers of government are distributed among many officials, all engaged in a common administrative work. The best evidence that the people themselves realized this fundamental weakness in our county governments is the fact that in recent years when the county has taken over new functions it has appointed and not elected the man to exercise these functions. County public-road work and county welfare work are illustrations of this.

The evils of the long ballot have in recent years been clearly shown by our foremost students of government. Nowhere are these evils more manifest than in county government. And yet we have done less to correct them there than in any other field.

Self-government, locally, has been regarded from the earliest days as the cornerstone of our political structure. Unless the people of the several communities are able in the main to take care of their own affairs, too great a strain is placed upon the central government and a highly developed bureaucracy is inevitable. We have already gone too far in this direction. The present tendency will continue unless local government becomes more efficient. It is sometimes urged that to consolidate counties is a move away from local self-government. Quite the reverse, I think, is true. If counties are so small that their revenues will not support an adequate county government, the State will be more and more inclined to take over duties that can be better performed by the county. If we would check the encroachment of the State upon the functions now exercised by the county we must make the county government so efficient that there will be no reason for such a change. Many years ago Elihu Root pointed out in a noteworthy address that if the States did not successfully exercise their functions the Federal Government would gradually draw those functions to itself. The statement provoked much criticism, and yet he was but stating the simple truth. And so if we would preserve local government in the country, we must bring that government down to date, so that it will be able to cope with the new conditions which environ it.

In any ideal reconstruction of county government, the boundaries would be so changed as to make of the county a natural economic and social unit, regard being paid to the principal cities and towns and the territory naturally tributary to such. The aim would be to create a county in which community activities and community consciousness were possible. That it is possible to reconstitute the local subdivisions of government so as to enhance community cooperation and community consciousness no one can doubt. And, therefore, instead of local self-rule suffering, it would in reality be advanced.

The town or township, as it is sometimes called, is a still smaller unit of government which has largely survived its needs. No one but the town assessor knows what its boundaries are. In the earlier days of slow and difficult transportation to the county seat the township had real significance. It was small in extent, because otherwise its citizens could not assemble even once a year. It was supposed to resemble the New England towns which, from the beginning, have been the real unit of government in that portion of the United States. Never, however, in its best days did town government in the United States generally approach in efficiency the towns of New England. Now, with the coming of swift and easy transportation, the reason for town government, outside of New England, seems largely to have disappeared. Gradually its functions have been taken over by the county.

The roads are being constructed and maintained more and more by the county and State. Even where the township road commissioner survives he is under the supervision of the county authorities. In this State we formerly had town collectors of taxes. These officials did little or nothing and were rewarded with 2 per cent upon the taxes paid. During my service as governor of the State we abolished these township collectors. The result has been a direct saving to the State of more than $2,000,000 annually, with the taxes collected more efficiently than before by the county officials. Competent authority estimates that the indirect saving has been in excess of this $2,000,000. Even the township assessor, the last of the town officials who is really active, seems on the way to extinction, as county assessment of all property is now regarded a more equitable method than township assessment.

It may be that the township can be reconstructed so as to become a self-conscious community. The closely knit community, wherever it has been established in rural America, has contributed greatly to the well-being of the members of the community. These communities, however, no longer follow township lines. If, then, something can be created to take the place of the present township, which shall be in fact a rural community, it will be of immense benefit not only to the community itself but to the country at large.

It is often said that we have too much government. Whether this be true or not, it certainly is a fact that we have too many governments. An extreme illustration is the county of Cook, in this State. Chicago, as you know, is situated in this county. All the activities of the county, social, economic, and political, revolve around that city. In fact, Cook County comprises only a part of the metropolitan district of which Chicago is the heart. Portions of other counties are as directly related to Chicago as Cook County is. And yet Cook County alone contains within its borders 392 independent local governments. Is it any wonder that Chicago, with all its vast resources, should be in financial distress?

We are admonished by the current of events that the great problem confronting all civilized countries is to keep public expenditures within public revenues. We have recently seen the great Republic of Germany on the verge of collapse because she could not balance her budget. We have seen the greatest empire of modern times, which has boasted for more than a century that the sun never sets upon her flag, in financial distress threatening the credit structure of the world because she could not keep her expenditures within her income. Are we in America sure that the same danger does not threaten us? With the deficit of our National Government for the last year almost a billion dollars, our deficit for the current fiscal year probably one and a half billion dollars, many of our States and cities and minor political subdivisions in distress, isn't it time for us to take warning from what is happening all round the world?

So much upon the subject of taxation, your special subject for the day. I can not let this occasion pass, however, without briefly discussing some of the other handicaps under which agriculture is laboring at the present time. For the past decade prices of farm products have been lower than the prices of other commodities and services. In a simpler society we were accustomed to see prices move upward or downward together. With the deflation of 1920 a new phenomenon appeared. The prices of farm products declined rapidly, while other prices to a great extent successfully resisted such decline. The explanation by the economists of this disparity was that since earlier depressions other classes of society had succeeded in effecting organizations powerful enough to resist, or at least to moderate, the decline of prices.

The farmers were told that they, too, must organize if they were to acquire the same influence over the price of their products which others enjoy. Cooperative marketing, therefore, seemed to be the remedy for this unbalanced condition.

Organization of the farmers for the purpose of marketing their crops collectively has progressed. Denmark had shown how, under the most adverse circumstances, it could transform the agriculture of a people. Wherever cooperative marketing is farthest advanced, either in the United States or abroad, there you find agriculture in its best estate; violent fluctuations in the markets lessened; better prices to the producers without an increase in cost, and sometimes with an actual decrease to the consumer; an approach to standardization of product; a more intelligent effort to adjust production to probable demand; a finer and more satisfying community life.

It is doubtful, however, if the cooperatives of the staple farm products will ever be sufficiently organized to give them the power in the making of prices which others now enjoy unless some way be found by which the cost to the cooperatives is borne equally by all producers of the particular commodity. If the producers of any staple farm product are only organized, even though a substantial majority of the producers have united in the cooperative, the producers of that commodity who are not members of the cooperative receive the full benefit of the improved price which the increased bargaining power of the cooperative may secure, without bearing any burden incident to the operations of the cooperative.

It is impossible to maintain the morale of an organization when outsiders receive its benefits in a larger measure than do the members themselves. For this reason the tobacco cooperatives and some others were driven out of business.

I have pointed out how the deflation of 1920 bore more heavily upon the farmers than any other class. Again, when in 1929 the debauch in Wall Street was over and prices generally started downward, farm prices outdistanced all others in the downward march. And for exactly the same reason. As Professor Rogers, of Yale, has recently said, with some prices "entirely rigid, others only partly flexible, and still others, like those of many of our basic raw materials, such as cotton and wheat, completely and immediately responsive to conditions of supply and demand," not only was it inevitable that farm prices should decline more rapidly than other prices, but also that "all sorts of maladjustments would make their appearance." Thus, not only have the farmers suffered as a result of these maladjustments, but all classes of society as well. I have been trying to tell the country for 10 years that we could not maintain general prosperity unless some way were found to correct these maladjustments of which Professor Rogers speaks.

By legislative policies we have created a domestic level of prices higher for those commodities which the farmer must buy in order to carry on his business than obtain in other parts of the world. If it is impossible to make that higher level of prices apply to farm products, how long will the American farmer endure these Government policies which put him at this ruinous disadvantage?

We have erected our tariff barriers ever higher and higher, beyond anything that Hamilton or Clay or Blaine, or even McKinley, ever dreamed. "Tariffs in imitation of or in retaliation for our own" have been adopted by most of the world, with an ever-narrowing market for the products of the farm. The great manufacturing industries of our country are increasingly transferring their operations to foreign lands. It can hardly be claimed that these factories, erected abroad by American capital and employing foreign labor, add to our home market for the farmer's wheat and cotton and corn and livestock. And yet this has always been the basis of the appeal to farmers for their support of a protective tariff.

In September of the present year farm commodity prices were 20 per cent below the 5-year average of 1909–1914. And yet the prices of the supplies the farmer buys, not including taxes and freight, were 27 per cent above the pre-war level.

Now, I submit that there can be no permanent recovery from this depression until this gross inequality has been removed. Let it be remembered that 40 per cent of the purchasing power of our country commonly abides in the farming population and those directly dependent upon it. In other words, in normal times it is worth about four times our entire foreign market.

If, then, farm prices are not to move upward, other prices must come down. If this means a revision of the tariff downward, let that revision be made. If it means lower wages in certain industries where the high labor cost is an important part of the price of the commodity, whatever we may wish, such wages must be lowered. The philosophy of high wages is sound enough if some sort of balance is maintained as between the different large groups of our population. We can not keep this complex economic machine moving, however, if certain millions of our people receive for their labor $1.50 or $2 an hour and certain other millions receive 10 cents an hour for work requiring equal or superior skill. For the millions upon the lower level of income can not buy the products of the other millions. We have the tragic problem of at least 7,000,000 of our fellow citizens out of work. How can they return to useful and productive labor unless something approaching an equilibrium between the prices of other commodities and the prices of farm products be restored?

Even, however, if prices had moved down in unison, though farmers out of debt would find themselves in a much improved condition, debtors would be weighted down by an intolerable burden. The dollar of to-day is worth about as much as a dollar and a half was worth five years ago. And so it follows that those farmers who incurred indebtedness a few years ago to improve their farms or to purchase better equipment or better livestock, in response to the urge of the agricultural colleges and other leaders in agriculture, are now in a position where for every dollar they borrowed they must now pay a much larger sum. That injustice is breaking the backs of many of our best and most progressive farmers.

This is the question which is uppermost in the minds not only of the farming population but of our people generally. There has been an immense amount of discussion upon this subject in recent months. There are a great many economists who believe that it is possible to undo some of the deflation which has occurred in recent years. Only the other day, as reported in the Wall Street Journal, two eminent professors of economics, James H. Rogers, of Yale, and Lionel D. Edie, formerly of Chicago University, expressed themselves unequivocally of the opinion that it was possible, even under existing circumstances, for the Federal reserve banking system, by the exercise of powers which it already possessed, to improve greatly the general price level. Many of our most eminent economists believe that it had it within its power before the debacle of Wall Street two years ago to check the inflation of credit which resulted in that debacle, and afterwards, before deflation had gone so far as to inflict the gravest injury upon our entire economic life, to arrest further deflation.

All classes now agree that unless there is an improvement in the general price level there can be no substantial relief from the unprecedented depression in which we find ourselves. The question, therefore, is a vital one. We have boasted in the past of our ability to meet new situations as they arose. To say that nothing can be done in this matter is the counsel of despair. Why not give heed to the opinions of the long line of eminent economists who believe that, without any disturbance to our gold standard, we have it within our power to erase some of the drastic deflation from which we are now suffering. And that deflation is the greatest in our history and it seems to be gathering momentum all the time. The decline in bank credit has been more rapid in recent months than at any time since deflation set in. Unless some way can be found to check this contraction of credit, thoughtful students fear that we have by no means yet seen the worst.

There is another phase of the banking situation upon which I wish to touch briefly. We have gone insane in this country in our banking operations upon the subject of liquid assets. Liquidity and mobility are the two chief characteristics of the present day. The bank examiners insist upon banks throughout the country having nothing but what they call liquid assets.

I remember very well that when the Federal reserve system was devised, the fundamental principle upon which that system was founded was that commercial paper representing goods in the intermediate stages between production and consumption were liquid assets, because they liquidated themselves. That was the theory of the Federal reserve system, and the issue of currency was based upon this paper. To-day, however, the banking authorities regard bonds, which are the very opposite of quick assets as understood when the Federal reserve system was adopted, more liquid than paper representing cattle or hogs or crops, or almost anything else—and so the banks have been driven to withdraw their investments from the farmers and the small tradespeople to invest in bonds. These bonds, by the way, were largely floated by the great banking houses of New York.

Our bankers down the State—and I suppose this is true elsewhere throughout the country—tell me that they have lost more money on bonds which they have been compelled to buy than they have on all the loans they have made to farmers. Bonds of many foreign countries are quoted at only a small portion of the purchase price. They are selling now for something more, I believe, than the commissions which these banking houses received. And yet those bonds have been approved by our bank examiners in preference to loans to farmers for legitimate purposes.

One of the most prominent bankers in Illinois told me the other day that the prejudice against farm loans is so great that one national bank examiner insisted on his having a chattel mortgage if he made a loan to a farmer to buy cows or other livestock or he would not count the loan as an asset of the bank; and then when my friend went to the Federal reserve bank they would not discount the paper secured by the chattel mortgage because that was against the law.

One arm of the Government insisted on the chattel mortgage before permitting the bank to make the loan, and another branch of the same Government refused to discount the paper because it was accompanied by a chattel mortgage!

Now, all the authorities agree that the business of this modern world is carried on, not by cash, as it was in more primitive times, but largely by credit; and whenever you curtail the basis of credit you injure the whole business structure and help to bring upon us such a crisis as we are facing now.

Then there is land. Why, it is no longer respectable to own land, and you can't talk to a banker about making a loan on land. Is it because of the fact that in this hurried age we have gotten into a frame of mind in which we want nothing that can not be converted into cash instantly or that we can't leave overnight?

In all the past good land has been one of the objects most keenly sought. Not only have individuals so thought of land, but nations as well have regarded themselves happy when they could add to their domain some area somewhere of fertile soil. Two years ago last winter I visited Egypt. The historic valley of the Nile contains only about 10,000 square miles of delta land, and yet every empire of ancient times hazarded war to gain possession of these 10,000 square miles. Rome's possession of this area probably prolonged the life of the Roman Empire for a century or more by furnishing food to the Roman populace when it was no longer able to feed itself.

In the Mississippi Valley alone we have about four times as much delta land as Egypt contains. This single resource ought to distinguish us among nations. And these lands are but a small part of our agricultural heritage. All at once, however, we seem to have abandoned our idea as to their importance and value. Perhaps in earlier times we attached too much importance to land. If so, we have now gone to the other extreme.

Now, if these lands, or mortgages upon these lands, are held in a bank they are called "frozen" assets. Well, no one likes "frozen" assets, but the banks at the urge of the authorities have been buying bonds, foreign and others, because, as we are told, they can be sold upon the New York Stock Exchange. These bonds never "freeze," it is true, but many of them have evaporated into thin air, and I predict that if we ever return to sanity those "frozen" assets of to-day will be the basis of our financial recovery and not these so-called liquid assets.

We have got to restore our faith in these fundamental things before we shall emerge from this depression.

The farmer has been going through the hardest year he has experienced in all his career. According to the Department of Agriculture, in a statement recently issued, his income for the year ending July 1 last was about $350,000,000 less than the average wage of farm labor, which itself was ridiculously low, as the department tells us. In other words, he received no income upon his investment; he received no compensation for his management, and received $350,000,000 less than he would have received if he had been at work for some one else.

If a year ago last spring the farmers of the United States had found some benevolent person to whom they could have given all their property, their lands, and their livestock and other equipment and everything else that they owned and then could have gone to work for this benevolent person, they would have been $350,000,000 better off at the end of the year than they are now. And yet they are going on even in these difficult times. Drive across the country or go by train between distant points, and everywhere you see the farmer in his field gathering his crops or preparing for another year. Drought may come and wither his fields until they look like desert wastes, or flood may come and ruin in its wake; yet he goes on planning and working for the future.

Now, some of our friends in the city say he ought not to do this; that he ought to let his lands lie idle until consumption overtakes production. And yet I am wondering if the farmer's instinct to produce something of value when he sees millions all round the world hungry and but half clothed who need these products of his toil—I wonder if this instinct is not sounder than the teachings of some of our city friends. I wonder if he is not sensing the fact that the trouble comes from the world's maldistribution of goods and services rather than from overproduction by himself. I am sure that whether I am right about this or not, the farmers of America are setting an example to all of us which we might well imitate. If our people in the cities would but cooperate with agriculture in removing the handicaps of which I have spoken and then catch the spirit of these farmers who are carrying on in spite of all their difficulties the dark clouds that fill the sky would pass swiftly by.

SENATE

MONDAY, APRIL 25, 1932

Rev. Anson Phelps Stokes, D. D., LL. D., canon of the Washington Cathedral, city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, who hast given us this good land for our heritage, we humbly beseech Thee that we may always prove ourselves a people mindful of Thy favor and glad to do Thy will. Bless our land with honorable industry, sound learning, and pure manners. Save us from violence, discord, and confusion, from pride and arrogancy, and from every evil way. Defend our liberties and fashion into one united people the multitudes brought hither out of many kindreds and tongues. Endue with the spirit of wisdom those to whom we intrust the authority of government, especially the Members of this Senate, that there may be justice and peace at home, and that through obedience to Thy law we may show forth Thy praise among the nations of the earth. Especially in this day of anxiety and distress suffer not our trust in Thee to fail. All of which we ask through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Friday last, when, on request of Mr. FESS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8083) providing for the appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy of all midshipmen who graduate from the Naval Academy in 1932; requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. VINSON of Georgia, Mr. MCCLINTIC of Oklahoma, Mr. DREWRY, Mr. BRITTEN, and Mr. DARROW were appointed as managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 25) providing for printing additional copies of the hearings before the Senate Committee on Finance on the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the current resolution (S. Con. Res. 18) authorizing the printing of 3,000 additional copies of hearings held before the Committee on Manufactures on the establishment of a national economic council, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 11290) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CHANGE IN DATE OF INAUGURATION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Governor of Rhode Island with an accompanying resolution of the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND AND PROVIDENCE PLANTATIONS,
EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Providence, April 23, 1932.

The PRESIDING OFFICER OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: In accordance with the request of the General Assembly of Rhode Island I am inclosing herewith a certified copy of a resolution passed at its recent session.

Respectfully,

NORMAN S. CASE, Governor.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND, ETC.,
IN GENERAL ASSEMBLY,
January Session, A. D. 1932.

Resolution relative to the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress

Whereas at the first session of the Seventy-second Congress of the United States of America it was resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein) that the following article be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution, viz:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 20th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 3d day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 3d day of January unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

"SEC. 3. If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the President, the President elect shall have died, the Vice President elect shall become President. If a President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice President elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case wherein neither a President elect nor a Vice President elect shall have qualified, declaring who shall then act as President, or the manner in which one who is to act shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President shall have qualified.

"SEC. 4. The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

"SEC. 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 15th day of October following the ratification of this article.

"SEC. 6. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission":

Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island does hereby ratify the above-proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States; and be it further

Resolved, That the governor be requested to transmit a copy of these resolutions and preamble to the Secretary of State of the United States, to the Presiding Officer of the United States Senate, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Providence, April 20, 1932.

I hereby certify the foregoing to be a true copy of a resolution entitled "Resolution relative to the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress," passed by the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations on the 14th day of April, A. D. 1932, and approved by his excellency the governor on the 18th day of April, A. D. 1932.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the State of Rhode Island, this 20th day of April, in the year 1932.

[SEAL.] ERNEST L. SPRAGUE,
Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a letter of the secretary of state of Maine, with an accompanying resolution of the Legislature of the State of Maine, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
STATE OF MAINE,
Augusta, April 19, 1932.

To the honorable the PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: In accordance with the provisions of the attached resolution of the Legislature of the State of Maine, I have the honor to forward you herewith a certified and fully authenticated copy of a resolution titled as follows:

"A resolve ratifying proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress, and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress."

The same was adopted by the Legislature of the State of Maine on April 1, A. D. 1932.

Respectfully,

EDGAR C. SMITH, Secretary of State.

STATE OF MAINE.

I, William Tudor Gardiner, Governor of the State of Maine, hereby certify that Edgar C. Smith is the secretary of the State of Maine, duly elected and qualified; that he is the legal custodian of the great seal of the State of Maine; and he is the legal custodian of the laws, resolves, and resolutions enacted by the Legislature of the State of Maine. I further certify that his attestation to the document hereunto annexed is in due form; that I am well acquainted with his handwriting, and that I verily believe his signature subscribed to said attestation is genuine.

In testimony whereof I have caused the great seal of the State to be hereunto affixed.

Given under my hand at Augusta this 1st day of April, A. D. 1932, and in the one hundred and fifty-sixth year of the independence of the United States of America.

[SEAL.] WM. TUDOR GARDINER, Governor.

STATE OF MAINE,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, Edgar C. Smith, secretary of state of the State of Maine, certify that by the constitution and laws of this State I am custodian of the seal of said State and of the laws, resolves, and resolutions enacted by the Legislature of the State of Maine. I further certify that the paper to which this certificate is annexed is a true copy of a resolve entitled "A resolve ratifying proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress, and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress."

In testimony whereof I have caused the great seal of the State to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand at Augusta this 1st day of April, A. D. 1932, and in the one hundred and fifty-sixth year of the independence of the United States of America.

[SEAL.] EDGAR C. SMITH, Secretary of State.

STATE OF MAINE, 1932.

A resolve ratifying proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress, and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress

Whereas the Seventy-second Congress of the United States of America, at the first session begun and held at the city of Washington on Monday, the 7th day of December, 1931, by a Constitutional two-thirds vote in both Houses, adopted a joint resolve proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, to wit:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of said Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided in the Constitution:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 20th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 3d day of January of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 3d day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

"SEC. 3. If, at the time fixed for the beginning of the term of the President, the President elect shall have died, the Vice President elect shall become President. If a President shall not have been chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President elect shall have failed to qualify, then the Vice President elect shall act as President until a President shall have qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case wherein neither a President elect nor a Vice President elect shall have qualified, declaring who shall then act as President, or the manner in which one who is to act shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President shall have qualified.

"SEC. 4. The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice shall have devolved upon them.

"SEC. 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 15th day of October following the ratification of this article.

"SEC. 6. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission":

Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of Maine hereby ratifies and adopts this proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States: And be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Maine notify the President of the United States, the Secretary of State of the United States, the President of the Senate of the United States, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States of this action of the legislature by forwarding to each of them a certified copy of this resolve.

IN SENATE CHAMBER,
April 1, 1932.

Read and adopted. Sent down for concurrence.

ROYDEN V. BROWN, Secretary.
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
April 1, 1932.

Read and adopted.

CLYDE R. CHAPMAN, Clerk.

Hussey and other members of the Unitarian Women's Alliance, of New Bedford, Mass., indorsing the stand taken by the American delegation to the Geneva disarmament conference for a policy of universal reduction of armaments, coupled with abolition of the more frightful methods of warfare, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of sundry manufacturers of the States of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, remonstrating against the imposition of a duty of 66 per cent on imports of crude petroleum, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens, being employees of the Weymouth branches of the Boston (Mass.) postal district, remonstrating against proposed reductions in the compensation of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PROPOSED GENERAL LAFAYETTE COMMEMORATIVE STAMP

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I present a letter from Mr. P. J. Connelly, president of the Dorchester (Mass.) Board of Trade, indorsing the movement sponsored by the Suburban Stamp and Curio Club of Boston, to secure a General Lafayette commemorative stamp, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD, with the accompanying paper, and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the letter and accompanying paper were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DORCHESTER BOARD OF TRADE,
Boston, Mass., April 14, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: We heartily indorse the movement sponsored by the Suburban Stamp and Curio Club of Boston to secure a General Lafayette commemorative stamp.

This honor would be especially appropriate in this year of Washington commemoratives, as Lafayette was Washington's loyal and true friend.

The attached circular will outline Lafayette's many services for our country.

We would appreciate any support and cooperation you may be in a position to extend in this worthy undertaking.

With kind personal regards, I remain, very truly yours,

P. J. CONNELLY,
President.

A commemorative stamp to the memory of General Lafayette would be especially appropriate in this year of Washington commemoratives.

He was the friend of Washington and of all the men whom the fortunes of war brought across Washington's path, there was none who became dearer to him than Lafayette, for the generous, high-spirited young Frenchman, full of fresh enthusiasm and brave as a lion, appealed at once to Washington's heart.

The excellent service of Lafayette in the field, together with his invaluable help in securing the French alliance, deepened and strengthened the sympathy and affection, which were entirely reciprocal.

Lafayette served in the Army without pay and gave his money, his talents, his influence, and his blood for the cause of American freedom. He was the most-loved person who has ever come from a foreign country.

In response to the invitation of President Monroe in 1824, he visited the United States and was everywhere received with tokens of enthusiastic reverence and affection.

He laid the corner stone of Bunker Hill Monument and afterwards refused to take the seat which had been reserved for him among the officials and invited guests. He said he belonged among the survivors of the Revolution and there he would sit. So he took a seat among the veterans with no shelter from the rays of a June sun.

The one hundred and seventy-fifth anniversary of the birth of General Lafayette will be September 6, 1932.

Would you not favor a commemorative stamp to the friend of Washington?

The Surburban Stamp and Curio Club of Boston is the sponsor of this movement and asks both your indorsement and your assistance.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, in the course of the debate on the Philippine bill we probably shall hear again the argument that Congress may not constitutionally grant independence to the Philippine Islands. Some of those who use this argument are undoubtedly convinced of its validity. Others, however, are urging objection not because they would prevent a breach or a disregard of the Constitution but because for quite different reasons they hope to make it an obstacle to Philippine independence. They well know that our policy from the beginning of our sovereignty over the islands, the traditions upon which that policy was founded, our solemn promises to the Filipino people, our obligation to ourselves—all demand that we give the Filipino people separate, independent nationhood.

These objectors are aware they can not successfully make pure selfishness a ground for keeping the islands and not keeping our word. Their dream of empire in the Far East, their hope of a military satrapy according to European models, their wish to exploit the resources of a country which we have long since dedicated to freedom—none of these, they foresee, can be offered to the American people as a sufficient excuse for breaking faith with the Filipinos and the whole world. They are compelled, then, to invent an argument that will seem at least somewhat worthy of the great question under discussion. They can not afford to call this proposal "unbusinesslike" or "unprofitable" or "unimperial"—as they really would like to characterize it—so they term it "unconstitutional."

One of the authors of this argument is the late Daniel Williams, formerly judge of a court of land registration in the Philippine Islands. I do not pretend to say how much weight lawyers attach to Judge Williams's contention, but it is repeated by some of the laymen who are opposing independence. The answer to the argument has been given by some of the greatest constitutional lawyers in our history, Republicans as well as Democrats. The answer has been given also by an Attorney General of the United States, not informally or by way of personal opinion, but officially, as counselor of the Federal Government.

President McKinley was a sound lawyer as well as a legislator of long and wide experience. It is safe to assume, moreover, that in his recommendations to Congress with respect to the disposition of the Philippine Islands he consulted his Attorney General, one of the leading jurists of his time.

The whole subject [of the Philippines] is now with Congress—and Congress is the voice, the conscience, and the judgment of the American people. Upon this judgment and conscience can not we rely?

Said President McKinley—

This statement of President McKinley's must be remembered in connection with another he made.

We shall continue as we have begun—

He said to Congress in December, 1899—

* * * to make these people * * * feel that it is their liberty and not our power * * * we are seeking to enhance.

William Howard Taft had been a judge of the Federal circuit court before he became Secretary of War in President McKinley's Cabinet. Seventeen years after we acquired the Philippines, and in the light of all the congressional and political discussions of the status and destiny of the islands, and with a large knowledge of the Constitution, Mr. Taft said:

Should the Philippine people, when fit for self-government, demand independence, I should be strongly in favor of giving it to them * * *.

Mr. Taft reiterated that statement in one form or another and on one occasion or another in the years that followed, and even after he had served his term as President.

I think we may agree that the great constitutional lawyers in the House and the Senate, when the Jones law was in process of enactment, would have perceived and proclaimed the unconstitutionality of a congressional grant of Philippine independence if it in any way traversed the Constitution.

As recently as 1924 the Attorney General of the United States, responding to a request from the chairman of the House Committee on Insular Affairs, and after examination of the facts, the law, and the authorities, submitted the following opinion:

The Philippine Islands have never been incorporated into the United States as an integral part thereof. They are held as an insular possession appurtenant to the United States but not incorporated into the United States.

The Constitution of the United States has never been extended to the Philippine Islands. It has been so extended to the Territory of Alaska by congressional enactment.

Under the Constitution of the United States Congress has complete control over Territories. It likewise has such control over insular possessions and may do with such possessions as it may see fit. If Congress deems it expedient to grant complete independence to the people of the Philippine Islands or a limited independence, it may, in my judgment, do so.

Within the last 27 months the legislative counsel of the Senate, Mr. Charles F. Boots, prepared an opinion on this subject, and in it held that the severance of the Philippines from the sovereignty of the United States by an act of Congress would not be contrary to any provision of the Constitution. The opinion formulated by Mr. Boots may be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 29, 1930.

Justice Malcolm, of the Supreme Court of the Philippines, in his treatise on Philippine constitutional law, upholds a similar view.

Eminent lawyers of the House, like HATTON W. SUMNERS, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and JAMES M. BECK, formerly Solicitor General, and Senator BARKLEY, Senator SWANSON, and other Members of the Senate, concur in the opinion of the Attorney General. In fact, I am not aware that any lawyer in either branch of Congress contends that a constitutional amendment is required to empower Congress to grant the independence of the Philippines.

To the learning and research of Judge F. C. Fisher, formerly a justice of the Philippine Supreme Court, we owe a very scholarly and exhaustive discussion of Judge Williams's thesis. Judge Fisher's treatise, conclusively demonstrating the constitutional power of Congress to give independence to the Philippines, deserves a place in the chronicle of the Senate's debate on the bill granting independence to the Philippines. Accordingly, I ask that his brief on this subject be inserted in the body of the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, so that it shall be available for study by any Senator or other person who harbors honest doubts about the constitutionality of the legislation by which we design to keep the faith we have plighted to the Filipino nation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE CONSTITUTIONAL POWER OF CONGRESS TO WITHDRAW THE SOVEREIGNTY OF THE UNITED STATES OVER THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

(By F. C. Fisher, former associate justice, Philippine Supreme Court)

The essentially temporary nature of the control of the United States over the Philippine Islands has repeatedly been affirmed by our Presidents and by the national legislative bodies. The Senate, when advising the ratification of the treaty of Paris, expressly declared that it was not intended by approval of the cession of the Philippines by Spain to—

"incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands into citizenship of the United States, nor * * * to permanently annex said islands as an integral part of the United States; but * * * in due time to make such disposition of said islands as will best promote the interests of the citizens of the United States and the inhabitants of said islands."

In 1916 Congress, in the preamble to the Jones law (39 Stat. L. 545), declared that—

"* * * it is * * * the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein * * *."

Presidents have differed as to the time when the ultimate purpose should be accomplished, but not one of them has advocated its abandonment. Our policy in dealing with the Philippines has consistently pursued a course leading to independence.

All the official utterances on the subject assume that Congress has the power, under the Constitution, to relinquish our sovereignty over the Philippines and to authorize the establishment and recognition of an independent government of the islands. The existence of this authority is likewise assumed in all the various bills for the granting of independence to the Philippines which from time to time have been introduced into Congress. That such power exists is, however, denied by a few opponents of Philippine independence. The argument in support of this view was presented by the late Judge D. R. Williams, first in an article published in the Virginia Law Review (vol. 12, p. 1) and later in pamphlets published by him. Judge Williams's opinion has occasionally been cited in debates in Congress on the Philippine question; and as the insistence by the Farm Bureau and allied agricultural interests and by the American Federation of Labor upon an early grant of independence, for economic reasons, is practically certain to bring the subject to the fore in the present session of Congress, an examination of Judge Williams's argument in support of the contention that Congress has no power to take such action may be interesting and timely.

His argument may be summarized briefly as follows: Congress being an agent of the Nation, operating under enumerated delegated powers, is without authority to relinquish sovereignty over any American territory unless power to do so has been conferred by the Constitution, expressly or by necessary implication, and that none of the powers expressly conferred, or of the implied powers flowing from them, can be construed properly as involving authority in Congress to cede or relinquish sovereignty over territory. The only provision of the Constitution in any direct manner dealing with the disposal of territory occurs in paragraph 2, section 3, of Article IV, which provides that Congress shall have power "* * * to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States * * *."

But the Supreme Court of the United States has held (United States v. Gratiot, 14 Peters 526, 536) that the term "territory" as here used is merely descriptive of one kind of property, and is equivalent to the word "lands." This provision, therefore, relates to the disposal of proprietary rights, but does not authorize the transfer or relinquishment of sovereignty.

The fact that the Philippines are unincorporated territory, belonging to but not forming an integral part of the United States, Judge Williams considered to be irrelevant to the inquiry, and that our national sovereignty is a unit and is as complete with respect to the Philippines as it is with respect to Long Island. So, if Congress by vountary legislative action can divest our sovereignty over the Philippines, it could do so with respect to any other part of our national domain, and with equal right could dispose of an entire State; that if as the result of a calamitous war part of our territory were wrested from us by conquest or its cession demanded by a successful foreign enemy, this de facto situation might be recognized in the treaty of peace; but the fact that territory may be alienated in the exercise of the treaty-making power under the stress of force majeure does not authorize the conclusion that a voluntary cession of territory is within the jurisdiction of Congress. He admitted that the power to cede territory, like the power to acquire it, is an inherent attribute of sovereignty, possessed by all completely independent nations; but the power of the United States to cede territory, unless it be under duress, is asserted to be one which has not been delegated by the Constitution, but is one of those which are reserved to the people and still lie dormant in the body politic.

The conclusion is stated that if the American people are desirous of conferring upon Congress the power to alienate their sovereignty over the Philippines, or any other territory of the United States, the result can be accomplished only by specific delegation of the power through an amendment of the Constitution.

The premise is unsound, and in the light of available precedents and of a proper construction of the Constitution, the power to take the contemplated action will be found to reside in Congress.

Acquisition of territory: The frequent exercise by the United States of the power to acquire territory by treaty and by joint resolution of Congress and the recognition of that power by the courts leaves no room for doubt that the authority to expand the national domain is by the Constitution conferred upon the appropriate organs of the National Government. Louisiana, Texas, California, and the adjacent areas, Alaska, the Philippines, and Porto Rico, the Hawaiian Islands, Samoa, and the Guano Islands have been acquired, and no doubt exists as to the validity of the extension of our authority and jurisdiction over them. The theories as to the particular provision of the Constitution which authorized this action are important because of the light they shed upon the question of the power to cede territory, but before taking up this point attention will be drawn to action taken in the past in cases which seem to be analogous to the contemplated action with respect to the Philippines.

Cession of territory and relinquishment of sovereignty by the United States: In Judge Williams's brief on this subject he asserts that "no territory, once admittedly brought under the American flag, has ever been alienated."

This statement is too broad, and cases can be pointed out in which there have been cessions of territory subject to our sovereignty.

The Florida treaty: An instance of the exercise by the President and the Senate of the power to cede territory of the United States is to be found in the treaty with Spain by which the Floridas were acquired in 1819. The United States, after the acquisition of the Louisiana territory from France, asserted that the ceded area included the vast domain lying between the Sabine River and the Rio Grande, a contention vigorously disputed by Spain. In the correspondence between John Quincy Adams, then Secretary of State, and the Spanish Ambassador (Am. Stat. Papers, vol. 4, pp. 422 et seq.), which led up to the treaty of 1819, the American claim to this area was again asserted, and its renunciation was part of the consideration for the cession of the Floridas. The treaty, by article 1, transferred to the United States sovereignty over the Floridas and by article 2 fixed the boundary between the Spanish and American domains west of the Mississippi. The treaty adopted the Sabine as the western boundary of Louisiana to the 32° of latitude, thence following a course which excluded the Texas territory claimed by the United States. By the terms of the treaty "* * * The United States hereby cede to his Catholic Majesty, and renounce forever, all their rights, claims, and pretentions to the territories lying west and south of the above line * * *," and Spain reciprocally "cedes to the United States" all its rights to territories north and east of the line. It is to be noted that the language of the treaty precludes the idea that the line so fixed was true, pre-existing boundary.

The treaty, which was signed February 22, 1819, was promptly submitted by the President to the Senate for its approval, which was granted two days later. By its terms the treaty was to be ratified by both countries within six months, but that period expired without action by the Spanish Government. President Monroe, in his annual message to Congress of December 7, 1819, said:

"On the part of the United States this treaty was acceded to in a spirit of conciliation and concession. * * * For territory ceded by Spain other territory of great value, to which our claim was believed to be well founded, was ceded by the United States * * *."

This clearly demonstrates that the President and his Secretary of State must have been of the opinion that the treaty-making power includes the power to cede territory of the United States. It is true that the title to Texas asserted by the United States at that time was extremely debatable and had always been denied by Spain, but the quoted language indicates that the cession was not justified upon that ground. On the contrary, the President's statement clearly affirms that territory of the United States had been "ceded" to Spain in exchange for other territory.

It was maintained by many that the relinquishment of our claim to Texas was too high a price to pay for the Floridas. The failure of Spain to ratify the treaty within the agreed period was believed to relieve the United States of its obligations, and to leave matters as they were before its negotiation. One of the opponents of the treaty was Henry Clay, at that time a Member of the House. On April 3, 1820, he called up for debate in the House as a Committee of the Whole, the following resolutions sponsored by him:

"1. Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States vests in Congress the power to dispose of territory belonging to them, and that no treaty purporting to alienate any part thereof is valid without the concurrence of Congress.

"2. Resolved, That the equivalent proposed to be given by Spain to the United States in the treaty concluded between them on the 22d day of February, 1819, for that part of Louisiana lying west of the Sabine was inadequate, and that it would be inexpedient to make a transfer thereof to any foreign power or renew the aforesaid treaty."

In the debate which followed (Annals of Congress, 16th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 1719 et seq.) Clay pointed out that—

"In the Florida treaty it was not pretended the object was simply a declaration of where the western limit of Louisiana was; it was, on the contrary, the case of an avowed cession of territory from the United States to Spain. The whole of the correspondence manifested that the respective parties to the negotiation were not engaged so much in an inquiry where the limit of Louisiana was as that they were exchanging overtures as to where it should be."

Clay maintained with vigor that the United States had a valid title to Texas under the Louisiana Purchase, and that Texas was worth more than Florida; that no such cession of territory could be made without the consent of Congress, because by section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution the power to "dispose of" territory is given to that body.

The debate on Clay's resolutions continued for two days, but the record does not show that any vote was taken. In October, 1820, the Spanish Cortes and the King of Spain ratified the treaty. February 14, 1821, President Monroe transmitted the treaty to the Senate with a message in which he drew attention to the fact that the Spanish ratification had occurred after the 6-month period, and requested a reaffirmance of the Senate's consent and approval. This was given five days later. The original vote of approval had been unanimous; the second approval was carried by 40 ayes and 4 nays (Executive Journal of the Senate, Vol. III, pp. 178 and 244).

The history of this treaty has an important bearing upon the question under consideration. It shows that President Monroe, Mr. Adams, and almost all the Members of the Senate were of the opinion that the Government created by the Constitution was vested by that instrument with power to cede territory of the United States, not alone under the duress of war, but in peace. The second vote in the Senate was taken after the debate upon Clay's resolutions in the House had drawn attention to the question of constitutional law involved. It is further significant that Clay and his supporters in the House did not dispute, but affirmed, the existence under the Constitution of the power to cede territory, their contention being that its exercise pertained to Congress rather than to the President and the Senate; or rather that the consent of Congress was essential to the valid exercise of this particular manifestation of the treaty-making power.

The northeastern boundary treaty: The Webster-Ashburton treaty of 1842, by which the northeastern boundary between the United States and British territory was fixed, did not result in the determination of the location of a preexisting correct line, but in the establishment of a conventional line, in consequence of which territory which unquestionably lay within the United States was ceded to Great Britain. The language of the treaty clearly shows that neither party contended that the line agreed upon was the true one. On the contrary, the preamble, after stating that repeated attempts to ascertain the location of the line described in the treaty of 1783 had resulted in failure, declares it to be the purpose of the parties to avoid "further discussion of their respective rights" and to "agree on a conventional line * * * with such compensations and equivalents as are deemed just and reasonable."

The cession involved was made with the express assent of Maine, within which State the ceded area lay, with the concurrence of Massachusetts. The treaty recites that the United States agrees to pay Maine and Massachusetts the sum of $300,000 in equal moities "on account of their assent to the line of boundary described in this treaty, in consideration of the conditions and equivalents received therefor from the Government of Her Britannic Majesty."

It has been expressly recognized by Congress that the effect of this treaty was to divest the sovereignty of the United States over territory in the possession and control of the State of Maine.

The execution of the treaty resulted in claims against the United States by her citizens who were owners of land ceded to Great Britain, a summary of which is to be found in Senate Report No. 2132, Fifty-eighth Congress, second session. The act of March 3, 1877 (19 Stat. at L. 343), provided for compensation to the owners of some of these lands. The preamble to the act recites that by the treaty of August 9, 1842, through the adoption of a "conventional line" instead of the "true line," the United States "did cede to the British Crown a strip of land" of which 10,718 acres had been granted to citizens of the United States by Maine and Massachusetts "while the same were in the lines of the United States and for which the United States received compensation in equivalents and concessions from the British Crown * * * whereby said citizens became entitled to compensation for said lands so appropriated to public use," and provides for the payment by the Treasury to the owners thereof of the value of the "land taken from the State of Maine by said conventional line and included in the Province of New Brunswick."

The "conditions and equivalents" received from Great Britain for the cession of the area within the State of Maine are clearly stated in President Tyler's message of August 11, 1842, with which he transmitted the Webster-Ashburton treaty to the Senate of the United States (Letters and Papers of the Presidents, Vol. V, p. 2015). The President said:

"By the treaty of 1783 the line is to proceed down the Connecticut River to the forty-fifth degree of latitude, and thence west by that parallel until it strikes the St. Lawrence. Recent examinations have ascertained that the line hitherto received as the true line of latitude between these points was erroneous, and that the correction of this error would not only leave on the British side a considerable tract of territory hitherto supposed to belong to the States of Vermont and New York but also Rouses Point, the site of a military work of the United States. It has been regarded as an object of importance not only to extend the rights and jurisdiction of these States up to the line to which they have been considered to extend but also to comprehend Rouses Point within the territory of the United States. The relinquishment by the British Government of all the territory south of the line hitherto considered to be the true line has been obtained, and the consideration for this relinquishment is to inure by the provisions of the treaty to the States of Maine and Massachusetts."

This clearly shows that the treaty of 1842 was understood by the President, as it must have been by the Senate, to be one by which a part of Maine was ceded to Great Britain in order that we might obtain more valuable territory elsewhere, notwithstanding the fact, stated elsewhere in the message, that the United States and Maine "have entertained no doubt of the validity of the American title" to the territory so ceded. As the territory to be ceded was within a State, and therefore subject to State as well as National sovereignty, the consent of the State was deemed essential; but it is interesting to note that no doubt seems to have been entertained at the time as to the existence of power in the National Government to relinquish the sovereignty of the United States over territory to which our title was declared to be perfectly valid.

Samoa: By the treaty of December 2, 1899, between the United States, Germany, and Great Britain (Foreign Affairs, 1899, p. 667), Germany and Great Britain renounced in favor of the United States all their rights over the island of Tutuila and others of the Samoan group, and the United States and Great Britain made a similar renunciation in favor of Germany of their rights and claims over the islands of Upolu and Savaii and others.

In 1902, Mr. P. C. Knox, Attorney General of the United States (XXIII Ops. Atty. Gen. 629), in an opinion rendered at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury held that as by the treaty of December 2, 1899 "the exclusive sovereignty over [Tutuila] appears to be asserted by us and recognized by Great Britain and Germany, which nations formerly shared with us a protectorate," Tutuila must be regarded as domestic territory within the meaning of the tariff laws. The joint resolution of March 4, 1925 (43 Stat. 1357), definitely asserts our sovereignty over Samoa.

The history of our relations with Samoa (Moore, International Law Digest, Vol. I, p. 536 et seq.) shows that for some time prior to the negotiation of the treaty of 1899 the Samoan Islands, while nominally under a native king, were practically held in a condominium by the United States, Germany and Great Britain under the terms of the act of Berlin of June 14, 1889 (Foreign Relations, 1889, p. 352). It is important to note that while the assent of the native government of Samoa was contemplated with respect to the provisions of the act of Berlin, Samoa was not a party to the treaty by which, in the opinion of Mr. Knox, confirmed by the joint resolution of March 4, 1925, supra, Tutuila became subject to the sovereignty of the United States. If, therefore, exclusive sovereignty over Tutuila now exists, as asserted by Congress, as a result of the renunciation of their rights by Germany and Great Britain in favor of the United States (Hyde, International Law, Vol. I, p. 131), the conclusion is inevitable that at the time of the negotiation of that treaty sovereignty over the entire group was held in condominium by the three treaty powers and that the renunciation by the United States and Great Britain of their rights over the other Samoan Islands in favor of Germany constituted a cession of their sovereignty over that part of the Samoan Islands thereafter subject to the exclusive sovereignty of Germany.

Cuba: Congress, by the resolution of April 20, 1898, disclaimed any intention to exercise sovereignty over Cuba "except for the pacification thereof," and asserted its purpose to leave the government and control of the island to its people (30 Stat. 738). At that time, of course, the sovereignty of Spain over Cuba was complete, notwithstanding the existence of the insurrection. As the result of the war which followed, Spain, by the treaty of Paris, relinquished her sovereignty over Cuba, without in terms ceding it to the United States or to the Cuban insurgent government (treaty of Paris, Art. I). Between that time, however, and May 20, 1902, when the American military government in Cuba, pursuant to the Platt amendment, transferred the government to the President of the Cuban Republic, it seems clear that sovereignty over Cuba, from the standpoint of international law, was vested in the United States, although as a matter of domestic law Cuba was regarded as foreign territory during that period (Neely v. Hankel, 180 U. S. 109). It is to be noted, however, that in the Neely case the court said:

"It can not be doubted that when the United States enforced the relinquishment by Spain of her sovereignty in Cuba and determined to occupy and control that island * * * it succeeded to the authority of the displaced government so far at least that it became its duty under international law * * * to protect * * * the lives, the liberty, and the property * * * of the inhabitants," thus clearly recognizing the distinction between the situation from the standpoint of international law and that created, for domestic purposes, by the action of the National Government. During the occupation of Cuba the military authorities of the United States created and maintained a civil government, exercised legislative power, and established a judiciary (Neely v. Hankel, supra, p. 778). Indeed, it is difficult to imagine what greater authority could have been exercised had the occupation been under a formal assertion of sovereignty preliminary to annexation.

In this connection, the language of the Platt amendment (31 Stat. 897) is significant. By its terms the President was authorized to leave the "government and control" of Cuba to its people "as soon as" the contemplated Cuban Government had been established under a constitution embodying the conditions imposed. Obviously, the amendment recognized that at that time the "government and control" of Cuba was being exercised by the United States and would continue to be so exercised until the fulfillment of the prescribed conditions. Had the people of Cuba failed or been unwilling to accept the limitations upon the contemplated insular government imposed by the Platt amendment, the control of the United States and its exercise of sovereign powers in Cuba might have continued indefinitely.

Butler, writing in 1901, said:

"Whatever the status of Cuba may be as to the United States * * * its status as to other powers is that, so long as the occupation of the military forces of the United States continues, it must necessarily be considered as much under the jurisdiction of the United States Government as though it were an integral part of the territory thereof." (Treaty-Making Power of the United States, vol. 1, p. 189.)

The view that the effect of the treaty of Paris was to transfer the sovereignty of Spain over Cuba to the United States is expressed by Justices White, Shiras, and McKenna in their concurring opinion in Downes v. Bidwell (182 U. S. 244, 342), in which it is said:

"* * * Quite recently one of the stipulations contained in the treaty with Spain which is now under consideration came under review by this court. By the provision in question Spain relinquished 'all claim of sovereignty over and title to Cuba.' It was further provided in the treaty as follows:

"'And as the island is upon the evacuation by Spain to be occupied by the United States, the United States will, so long as such occupation shall last, assume and discharge the obligations that may under international law result from the fact of its occupation and for the protection of life and property.'

"It can not, it is submitted, be questioned that, under this provision of the treaty, as long as the occupation of the United States lasts, the benign sovereignty of the United States extends over and dominates the island of Cuba. Likewise it is not, it seems to me, questionable that the period when that sovereignty is to cease is to be determined by the legislative department of the Government of the United States in the exercise of the great duties imposed upon it and with the sense of the responsibility which it owes to the people of the United States and the high respect which it, of course, feels for all the moral obligations by which the Government of the United States may, either expressly or impliedly, be bound. Considering the provisions of this treaty and reviewing the pledges of this Government extraneous to that instrument, by which the sovereignty of Cuba is to be held by the United States for the benefit of the people of Cuba and for their account, to be relinquished to them when the conditions justify its accomplishment, this court unanimously held, in Neely v. Henkel (180 U. S. 109) that Cuba was not incorporated into the United States and was a foreign country. It follows from this decision that it is lawful for the United States to take possession of and hold in the exercise of its sovereign power a particular territory, without incorporating it into the United States, if there be obligations of honor and good faith which, although not expressed in the treaty, nevertheless sacredly bind the United States to terminate the dominion and control, when, in its political discretion, the situation is ripe to enable it to do so. Conceding, then, for the purpose of the argument, it to be true that it would be a violation of duty under the Consitution for the legislative department, in the exercise of its discretion, to accept a cession of and permanently hold territory which is not intended to be incorporated, the presumption necessarily must be that that department, which within its lawful sphere is but the expression of the political conscience of the people of the United States, will be faithful to its duty under the Constitution, and therefore when the unfitness of particular territory for incorporation is demonstrated the occupation will terminate" (pp. 342–344).

The Cuban Government, to which authority over the island was ultimately transferred, was clearly a creation of the United States. Its present status, from the standpoint of international law, is that of a dependent rather than an independent State. (Hyde, International Law, Vol. I, p. 26.) In consenting to its creation the United States reserved to itself powers of intervention incompatible with complete sovereignty on the part of Cuba (act of March 2, 1901). The Republic of Cuba was required to refrain, and so agreed, from entering into any treaty or compact with any foreign power.

"* * * which will impair or tend to impair the independence of Cuba, nor in any manner authorize or permit any foreign power or powers to obtain by colonization * * * or otherwise, lodgment in or control over any portion of said island."

Suppose that on account of a change in the conditions of international relations or for any other reason deemed sufficient to make it inadvisable, as a matter of national policy, the United States, in 1901, had determined not to carry out the purpose expressed in the joint resolution of April 20, 1898, but to retain Cuba and give it the same status as Porto Rico. Would any further cession from Spain have been necessary? Obviously not. Spain's sovereignty had ceased with its relinquishment by the treaty of Paris, and the status of Cuba was simply that of conquered territory in the possession of the United States and subject to its complete sovereignty and control. There was no government in Cuba other than that established by the United States. That control might have been continued indefinitely, and Cuba, as unincorporated territory or otherwise, brought under the sovereignty of the United States for all domestic purposes, as it was already from the standpoint of international law. When the United States permitted the establishment of the Cuban Republic and relinquished its control over Cuba, with the limitations noted, it accomplished the same result as that now contemplated with respect to the Philippines—a relinquishment of sovereignty. The power to accomplish this object can not, it is submitted, be traced to the original declaration of purpose as its source, for necessarily Congress can not create or augment its own powers, all of which are delegated and must rest upon the Constitution; but even though such declaration of purpose could be given any effect whatever with respect to the power to accomplish the relinquishment of sovereign control over Cuba, it is interesting to note that the Senate, when advising ratification of the treaty of Paris expressly declared (Magoon, Civil Government, p. 47):

"That by the ratification of the treaty of peace with Spain it is not intended to incorporate the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands into citizenship of the United States, nor is it intended to permanently annex said islands as an integral part of the territory of the United States; but it is the intention of the United States * * * in due time to make such disposition of said islands as will best promote the interests of the citizens of the United States and the inhabitants of said islands."

While this proposed joint resolution was not concurred in by the House at the time, a similar declaration of purpose and intention, as of the time of the acquisition of the Philippines, was made by Congress in the preamble to the Jones law.

Authoritative expressions of opinion regarding the power of the National Government of the United States to cede territory: The action taken by the Senate in authorizing ratification of the Florida treaty, the Webster-Ashburton treaty, and the Samoa treaty of necessity implied the belief on the part of the Members who voted in support of those measures that the President and the Senate, under the Constitution, are empowered to cede territory of the United States and relinquish sovereignty when it is deemed advantageous to do so.

The same opinion was expressed by necessary implication in section 4 of the Guano Islands act (11 Stat. 119), by which the right to abandon islands brought under the sovereign control of the United States pursuant to that statute is asserted. It must have been entertained by the Senators who voted in support of the proposed joint resolution (ante, p. 19) by which the temporary character of the retention of the Philippines was asserted, and by all Members of both Houses who voted in support of the Jones law.

If the question of the constitutionality of the proposed relinquishment of sovereignty over the Philippines could be presented for judicial review, the exercise of the power in the cited instances, and the adoption by the Senate and Congress of measures which of necessity imply the opinion that the power exists, would properly be taken into consideration and given great weight.

Henry Clay was evidently of the opinion (ante, p. 6) that Congress is vested with power to cede territory. Calhoun appears to have entertained the same view. In his Discourses on the Constitution and Government of the United States (vol. 1, p. 233) he said:

"There still remains another and more important limitation, but of a more general and indefinite character * * * among which it seems to be settled that it can not change or alter the boundary of a State or cede any portion of its territory without its consent. Within these limits all questions which may arise between us and other powers, be the subject matter what it may be, fall within the limits of the treaty-making power and may be adjusted by it."

In Moore's International Law Digest (Vol. V, p. 171 et seq.) citations show that such eminent authorities as Hamilton, Marshall, and Story were of the opinion that the power to cede territory had been delegated to the National Government. Mr. Justice Story is quoted as saying that in a conversation with Chief Justice Marshall that great authority said that:

"He was unequivocally of opinion that the treaty-making power did extend to cases of cession of territory, though he would not undertake to say it could extend to all cases; yet he did not doubt it must be construed to extend to some." (Moore, op. cit. Vol. V, p. 173.)

In Crandall's work on Treaties, Their Making and Enforcement, the author, after a review of the precedents, expresses the opinion that even as to territory within a State the power of cession is vested in the treaty-making power of our Government, and may be exercised whenever the vital necessity for such action arises. As to other cessions he says:

"In respect of territory not within the boundaries of a State, the Central Government exercises, subject to the express prohibitions of the Constitution applicable thereto, all the powers of government enjoyed by both the central and State Governments over territory within the limits of a State. * * * The power to cede outlying territory is no less essential to the full exercise of the treaty-making power of the United States * * * than is the power to acquire."

The same conclusion is expressed by Butler, after a full consideration of the applicable precedents with respect to the constitutional limitations upon the treaty-making power (Treaty Making Power of the United States, vol. 2, p. 393).

In Kent's Commentaries (Vol. I, p. 167, note 3) the learned author, after adverting to the fact that by the Webster-Ashburton treaty of 1842 territory claimed by Maine had been "ceded to Great Britain," says that as regards the power to cede territory within a State "the better opinion would seem to be that such a power of cession does reside exclusively in the treaty making power, under the Constitution of the United States * * *."

The opinion that the National Government is possessed of power to dispose of territory, not only through the treaty-making power but by act of Congress, is also expressed by Doctor Willoughby (Constitutional Law, vol. 1 (2d ed.), p. 424). He rests his opinion upon the theory of "resulting powers," to which reference is made (post, p. 36) hereafter.

In the case of Fort Leavenworth Railroad Co. v. Lowe (114 U. S. 525, 541) the court, referring to the Webster-Ashburton treaty, said, obiter:

"The jurisdiction of the United States extends over all the territory within the States, and, therefore, their authority must be obtained, as well as that of the State within which the territory is situated, before any cession of sovereignty or political jurisdiction can be made to a foreign country."

In the case of Gregory v. Riggs (133 U. S. 258, 267) it was said, citing the Fort Leavenworth Railroad Co. decision:

"The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited, except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the Government or its departments, and those arising from the nature of the Government itself and that of the States. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize that which the Constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the Government, or in that of one of the States, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter, without its consent. * * * But with these exceptions it is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country."

In Jones v. United States (137 U. S. 202) the court upheld the authority of Congress to regulate, by legislation, the exercise of the power of the United States, granted by the law of nations, to acquire territory by discovery and occupation and to exercise jurisdiction over territory so acquired—

"* * * for such period as it sees fit * * *."

This may be regarded as concurrence in the opinion of Congress, as expressed in the guano islands act, supra, that under the Constitution sovereignty over unincorporated territory may not only be acquired by legislative action but by like action may be relinquished.

In this connection the remarks of Mr. Justice White and the other concurring Justices in the case of Downes v. Bidwell (182 U. S. 244, 343) are interesting. There can be no doubt that the distinguished jurists who subscribed to that opinion held the view that Cuba at that time was unincorporated territory subject to the sovereignty of the United States, and that the obligation to withdraw it was moral, not legal. The joint resolution of April 20, 1898, was a statement of intention, no more binding in law than is the declaration of purpose in the preamble to the Jones law. Nevertheless the opinion was expressed by Justice White and his concurring associates that the "legislative department," in its own discretion as to time and conditions, might divest that sovereignty by relinquishment.

The power of Congress to establish an independent government in the Philippines is also assumed by Mr. Justice White in his "practical illustration" (p. 318) of an "autonomous government" for the islands, which might be created should Congress determine that their inhabitants should no longer "continue appurtenant to the United States." The same opinion is indicated equally forcibly in the opinion of the court in the cited case, written by Mr. Justice Brown. He said (p. 283):

"Whatever may be finally decided by the American people as to the status of these islands and their inhabitants—whether they shall be introduced into the sisterhood of States or be permitted to form independent governments—it does not follow that in the meantime * * * the people are * * * unprotected by * * * our Constitution * * * ."

It can not reasonably be understood that the reference in this citation to "the American people" indicates the view that their action by an amendment to the Constitution would be required to permit the grant of independence. The quoted remark relates equally to the admission of the new territory to statehood, which, if desired, the American people could exercise through the agency of Congress.

Again, in Justice White's concurring opinion in the cited case, he said (p. 317) that although as a result of a "calamitous war or the necessity of a settlement of boundaries" citizens of the United States might be expatriated "by action of the treaty-making power, expressly or impliedly ratified by Congress," this could not justify the general proposition that "territory which is an integral part of the United States may as a mere act of sale be disposed of."

The use of the word "integral" in this connection is significant, in view of the fact that the crux of the decision, with which the concurring Justices were in accord, is that—

"Porto Rico is a Territory appurtenant and belonging to the United States but not a part of the United States."

Another significant remark to be found in the opinion of the court (p. 285), written by Mr. Justice Brown, is that—

"If it be once conceded that we are at liberty to acquire foreign territory, a presumption arises that our power with respect to such territory is the same power which other nations have been accustomed to exercise with respect to territories acquired by them."

It will not be questioned that the general power to which reference is made includes not only the power of acquisition but the power of cession.

The status of the Philippines as unincorporated territory: It is apparent from what has been said that sharply differing opinions have always existed as to the power to dispose by cession of territory which pertains to a State; and the same doubt may exist, although in less degree, as regards the power, save under duress, to withdraw sovereignty over incorporated territory, such as Hawaii and Alaska, which is part of the United States. But the Philippines are not part of the United States but are territory belonging thereto; and it is believed that by reason of this fact the solution of the problem as to the power of Congress to release them from our sovereignty does not present the same questions as those which would arise were such action contemplated with respect to Alaska or Hawaii.

That the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico are unincorporated territories belonging to but not forming an integral part of the United States is now firmly established by a series of decisions, the most important of which are Downes v. Bidwell (182 U. S. 244), Door v. United States (195 U. S. 138), Rassmussen v. United States (197 U. S. 516), and Balzac v. Porto Rico (258 U. S. 298), decided in 1921. In the Balzac case the earlier decisions were summarized and approved in the statement that by them it had been "settled * * * and confirmed that neither the Philippines nor Porto Rico was territory which had been incorporated in the Union, or become a part of the United States as distinguished from merely belonging to it."

The practical result of this conclusion was the holding that "* * * the power to govern territory, implied in the right to acquire it, and given to Congress in the Constitution in Article IV, section 3, to whatever other limitation it may be subject, the extent of which must be decided as questions arise, does not require that body to enact for ceded territory, not made a part of the United States by congressional action, a system of laws which shall include the right of trial by jury, and that the Constitution does not, of its own force, carry such right to territory so situated."

The source of the power of Congress to cede or relinquish sovereignty over unincorporated territory: The fact that the Philippine Islands have not been incorporated into and do not form an integral part of the United States is one of great significance with respect to the power of the Congress to withdraw, by voluntary legislative action, the sovereignty of the United States over that part of the national domain. From the standpoint of international law there is no difference, as regards our relations with other States, between the sovereignty we exercise over Guam and that which we exercise over Long Island; but in view of the fact that it is with us settled domestic law that the Philippine Islands are not "a part of the United States," but territory "merely belonging to it" (Balzac v. Porto Rico, 258 U. S. 298), one's natural inclination, on approaching the subject, is to assume that there must in the nature of things be a fundamental difference between the relations of the United States, as an entity, to its constituent incorporated units, and the relations of that entity to unincorporated territory "merely belonging to it."

The United States unquestionably constitute a sovereign state, vested with all the powers which such states enjoy under the law of nations, which include the capacity to acquire and to cede territory (Hall, International Law, 4th Edition, pp. 47-48). It can not be disputed that the United States possesses these powers. The only question which has arisen concerning the matter is whether the authority to exercise the powers of the Nation has been delegated to the National Government by the Constitution, or whether it is a power inherent in the Nation but which still lies dormant in the body politic. With respect to the power to acquire territory, through the treaty-making power and congressional legislation, it is definitely settled that necessary authority has been vested by the Constitution in the National Government, and its repeated exercise has been acquired by treaty and by the action of Congress.

As summarized by Doctor Willoughby (op. cit., p. 408), the constitutional power to annex foreign territory has been held to arise from the power to admit new States into the Union (Constitution, Art. IV, sec. 3, cl. 1); the power to declare and carry on war (Constitution, Art. I, sec. 8, cl. 11); the power to make treaties (Constitution, Art. II, sec. 2, cl. 2); and the power, as a sovereign State, to acquire territory by discovery or occupation, or by any other methods recognized as proper by international usage.

After a review of the decisions which have sustained the power to acquire territory, Doctor Willoughby (op. cit., p. 419) says:

"It is to be observed that in none of these cases is there any argument to show just why, and in what manner, the acquiring of foreign territory is a necessary or proper means by which war may be carried on or treaties entered into. This leads to the consideration of the doctrine which constitutionally speaking, appeals to the author as the soundest mode of sustaining the power of the United States to acquire territory, as well as one which, in application, affords the freest scope for its exercise. According to this doctrine the right to acquire territory is to be searched for not as implied in the power to admit new States into the Union, or as dependent specifically upon the war and treaty powers, but as derived from the fact that in all relations governed by the principles of international law the General Government may properly be construed to have, in the absence of express prohibition, all the powers possessed generally by the sovereign states of the world. The doctrine thus is that the control of foreign relations being exclusively vested in the United States, that Government has in the exercise of this jurisdiction the same power to annex foreign territory that is possessed by other sovereign states."

An example of acquisition of territory, by authority of Congress, which can be justified only upon the theory advocated by Doctor Willoughby, is afforded by the guano islands act of 1856 (Revised Stats., secs. 5570 et seq.; U. S. C. A., secs. 1411 et seq.). By this act Congress provided that unoccupied guano islands, not subject to the jurisdiction of any other power when discovered and occupied by a citizen of the United States, might, at the discretion of the President, "be considered as appertaining to the United States."

It was provided that "all acts done and offenses or crimes committed" on such appurtenant islands should be subject to the laws of the United States applicable to national ships on the high seas. One of the islands brought under the operation of this act was Navassa. A homicide subsequently occurred on the island, and the prosecution of the offense involved a determination of the validity of the guano islands act. No express authority for the act can be found in the Constitution. The United States Supreme Court, nevertheless, decided that the legislation was valid (Jones v. United States, 137 U. S. 202), without direct reference to any specific provision of the Constitution or to the doctrine of implied powers, upon the ground that the United States as a sovereign state enjoys "by the law of nations" the power to acquire dominion of new territory by—

"* * * discovery and occupation as well as by cession and conquest * * *"—

And further held that this principle afforded—

"* * * ample warrant for the legislation of Congress concerning guano islands."

The opinion thus expressed was repeated many years after by Chief Justice Fuller in his dissent in Downes v. Bidwell (182 U. S. 244, 369), in which he said:

"The power of the United States to acquire territory by conquest, by treaty, or by discovery and occupation is not disputed, nor is the proposition that in all international relations, interests, and responsibilities the United States is a separate, independent, and sovereign nation."

The decision in the Guano Islands case clearly and of necessity implies that the court was of the opinion that the Constitution has conferred upon the organs of the National Government authority to exercise certain powers possessed by the United States by reason of its status as a sovereign nation, although such authority has not been included in words in the Constitution by express delegation or by necessary implication from any one of the expressly delegated powers. It is only upon this theory that such congressional legislation as the guano islands act and the resolution for the annexation of Hawaii can be satisfactorily explained and justified.

The Constitution (Art. I, sec. 8) delegates to Congress authority to make all laws "necessary and proper" for the exercise of the powers enumerated in the section, and also such laws as are needful to carry into execution "all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."

The effect of the adoption of the Constitution was to create a nation. It was and is vested, to the exclusion of the individual States, with all power appertaining to its status under the law of nations as a State (Pang Yue Tung v. United States, 149 U. S. 698). As Doctor Willoughby states (op. cit. Vol. I, p. 64):

"* * * The supreme purpose of our Constitution is the establishment and maintenance of a State which shall be nationally and internationally a sovereign body."

The same writer says (Vol. I, p. 66) that the doctrine of implied powers is sufficiently broad to justify the exercise by the Federal Government of powers not deduced from specific grants of authority, but from the fact that the United States, as to its own citizens, is "* * * a fully sovereign national state, and, with reference to other states, a political power equipped with all the authority possessed by other independent states."

This view was stated with great force by Senator Foraker in the Senate debate upon the annexation of Hawaii. He stated (Willoughby, Vol. I, p. 342) that prior to the organization of the Union each of the thirteen original States was vested with all the powers inherent in sovereignty, including the power to acquire new territory. By the creation of the Union under the Constitution the individual States surrendered this power. The necessary conclusion, he argued, is that the effect of the denial to the individual States of any power which they formerly possessed as an attribute of sovereignty was to confer it by implication upon the Federal Government. The Senator's contention is just as applicable to the power to cede unincorporated territory or to relinquish or abandon sovereignty over it as it is to the power to acquire it.

The wording of the last paragraph of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution clearly shows that its authors believed that other powers than those expressly or by implication conferred by the preceding specific enumeration had been vested in "the Government of the United States." It was recognized at an early period that there are powers of government delegated by the Constitution, which need not be traced directly, to warrant their exercise to one or more of the specifically enumerated grants. It was said by Chief Justice Marshall in Cohens against Virginia that "* * * it is not indispensable to the existence of every power claimed for the Federal Government that it can be found specified in the words of the Constitution or clearly and directly traceable to some one of the specified powers. * * * It is allowable to group together any number of them and to infer from them all that the power claimed has been conferred."

Justice Story, in his work on the Constitution (par. 1256), first published in 1833, says, after discussing the doctrine of implied powers:

"It may be well in this connection to mention another sort of implied power, which has been called with great propriety a resulting power arising from the aggregate powers of the National Government. It will not be doubted, for instance, that if the United States should make a conquest of any of the territory of its neighbors the National Government would possess sovereign jurisdiction over the conquered territory. This would, perhaps, rather be a result from the whole mass of the powers of the National Government and from the nature of political society than a consequence or incident of the powers specially enumerated. It may, however, if an incident to any, be an incident to the power to make war."

Justice Story states (par. 1285) that the only theory upon which the acquisition of Louisiana can be justified is that "the right to acquire territory was incident to national sovereignty; that it was a resulting power growing, necessarily, out of the aggregate powers confided to the Federal Constitution * * *." The subsequent acquisition of Florida, he points out (par. 1288), which was acquiesced in by all the States, "can be maintained only on the same principles," and illustrates the truth that "constitutes of government require a liberal construction to effect their objects * * *."

The germ of the theory of resulting powers arising from the Constitution, distinct from and in addition to the powers expressly granted, and those incidental to them, as expounded by Story, may, perhaps, be found in Hamilton's statement (The Federalist, Ford's edition, p. 657) that "it is not denied that there are implied as well as express powers, * * * and for the sake of accuracy it shall be mentioned that there is another class of powers which may be properly denominated resulting powers. * * * This would be rather a result from the whole mass of the powers of the Government and from the nature of political society than a consequence of either of the powers specially enumerated."

The theory of resulting powers arising from the Constitution as a whole, construed in the light of the purpose to create a sovereign nation, has been expressly recognized by the Supreme Court. In the legal tender cases (12 Wallace, 457, 533) the court, after asserting that the express powers should be construed in the light of the paramount purpose of the framers of the Constitution to create a "government sovereign within its sphere," said:

"The same may be asserted also of all the nonenumerated powers included in the authority expressly given 'to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the specified powers vested in Congress, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.' It is impossible to know what those nonenumerated powers are, and what is their nature and extent, without considering the purposes they were intended to subserve. Those purposes, it must be noted, reach beyond the mere execution of all powers definitely intrusted to Congress and mentioned in detail. They embrace the execution of all other powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof * * *.

"And here it is to be observed it is not indispensable to the existence of any power claimed for the Federal Government that it can be found specified in the words of the Constitution, or clearly and directly traceable to some one of the specified powers. Its existence may be deduced fairly from more than one of the substantive powers expressly defined, or from them all combined. It is allowable to group together any number of them and infer from them all that the power claimed has been conferred. Such a treatment of the Constitution is recognized by its own provisions. This is well illustrated in its language respecting the writ of habeas corpus. The power to suspend the privilege of that writ is not expressly given, nor can it be deduced from any one of the particularized grants of power. Yet it is provided that the privileges of the writ shall not be suspended except in certain defined contingencies. This is no express grant of power. It is a restriction. But it shows irresistibly that somewhere in the Constitution power to suspend the privilege of the writ was granted, either by some one or more of the specifications of power, or by them all combined. And that important powers were understood by the people who adopted the Constitution to have been created by it, powers not enumerated, and not included incidentally in any one of those enumerated, is shown by the amendments. The first 10 of these were suggested in the conventions of the States, and proposed at the first session of the First Congress, before any complaint was made of a disposition to assume doubtful powers. The preamble to the resolution submitting them for adoption recited that the 'conventions of a number of the States had, at the time of their adopting the Constitution, expressed a desire, in order to prevent misconstruction or abuse of its powers, that further declaratory and restrictive clauses should be added.' This was the origin of the amendments, and they are significant. They tend plainly to show that, in the judgment of those who adopted the Constitution, there were powers created by it, neither expressly specified nor deducible from any one specified power, or ancillary to it alone, but which grew out of the aggregate of powers conferred upon the Government, or out of the sovereignty instituted. Most of these amendments are denials of power which had not been expressly granted, and which can not be said to have been necessary and proper for carrying into execution any other powers. Such, for example, is the prohibition of any laws respecting the establishment of religion, prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press.

"And it is of importance to observe that Congress has often exercised, without question, powers that are not expressly given nor ancillary to any single enumerated power. Powers thus exercised are what are called by Judge Story in his Commentaries on the Constitution, resulting powers, arising from the aggregate powers of the Government * * *."

It is believed that the theory of resulting powers advanced by Story and expounded by Senator Foraker (ante, p. 35) is logical and convincing. That theory does not, of course, involve the assertion that there are vested in the National Government or in any department of it inherent sovereign powers—that is, powers which may be exercised independently of the Constitution, or which do not flow from the grants of power considered singly or collectively. While it may be admitted that it is difficult to define sharply the line which separates the resulting powers from those which, if asserted, could be maintained only upon the inadmissible theory of inherent sovereign powers, it is clear that the power to acquire territory, either by treaty or by congressional action, is one which is possessed by the National Government under the Constitution and not independently of it.

If the power to acquire territory is one which results from the creation of the United States as a sovereign nation by the Constitution, it seems equally clear that the power to cede territory is one which must be possessed by the National Government. If it is not essential to the exercise of the power to acquire territory to be able to point to some express grant of such power in the Constitution, or to find that it is implied as necessary or proper to the effective exercise of an express power, why should it be essential that the power to cede should be derived from the express or implied as distinguished from the resulting powers conferred by the Constitution? It is believed that on principle it is not and that the same reasoning which supports the power to acquire territory by discovery and occupation, as in the case of the guano islands (supra, p. 33) or the annexation of Hawaii by the action of Congress must lead to the conclusion that the power to cede territory is one which likewise results, growing (to use Justice Story's words) "necessarily out of the aggregate powers confided to the Federal Constitution." Unless it be conceded that they had in mind the power to "dispose of * * * territory * * * belonging to the United States * * * " conferred by section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution—a possibility considered elsewhere herein—upon what other theory than that of resulting powers can the authority to cede territory be made to rest by the members of the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of our Government who have from time to time asserted it? If, as President Monroe and Henry Clay believed and asserted, the ratification of the Florida treaty involved a cession of valid rights over Texas, upon what other possible theory of the Constitution could that treaty have been ratified? Mr. Justice White, for himself and Justices Shiras and McKenna, in his concurring opinion in the case of Downes v. Bidwell (supra), very definitely expressed the belief (p. 314) that the theory that the disposing clause of section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution "relates as well to a relinquishment or cession of sovereignty as to a mere transfer of rights of property, is altogether erroneous." Nevertheless, in the same concurring opinion it was said that if territory brought under the sovereignty of the United States is found by the "legislative department" to be unfit for incorporation, "the presumption necessarily must be that that department * * * will be faithful to its duty under the Constitution and, therefore, when the unfitness of particular territory for incorporation is demonstrated the occupation will terminate." If, as Justice White believed, the authority to relinquish or cede sovereignty can not be grounded upon the disposing clause of section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution, upon what theory, other than that of resulting powers, can it be assumed that the "legislative department" may withdraw sovereignty over territory believed unfit for incorporation?

The same theory must have been implied in the obiter statement (ante, p. 24) in the opinion in Gregory v. Riggs (133 U. S. 258, 267) that the treaty-making power, with the consent of a State of the Union, may cede territory within its boundaries. Such a cession would involve the relinquishment not only of State sovereignty but of the sovereignty of the United States. It could not be justified under section 3 of Article IV, for no area within a State can be regarded as "territory * * * belonging to the United States" within the meaning of that provision. The authority to make a cession of territory within a State, such as was contemplated in the cited decision and was exemplified by the Webster-Ashburton treaty (ante, pp. 9–11), can be referred only to the resulting powers of the National Government "growing out of the aggregate powers confided to the Federal Constitution" (Story, ante, p. 37).

If it be assumed, as it is believed it should, that the power to cede territory, subject to the limitations to be considered, is one of the resulting powers vested in the National Government by the Constitution, it is obvious that whether it is to be exercised by the treaty-making authority or by congressional legislation depends upon the character of the purpose to be accomplished. A cession of territory to a foreign state or its acquisition from such state would ordinarily be effected by treaty. The regulation of the acquisition of territory by discovery, or its relinquishment to permit the creation of a new state in the ceded territory, must be accomplished, if at all, by congressional action. Whichever may be the method adopted, the nature and source of the power exercised must be the same and subject to the same restrictions and limitations, if any there be.

If it be assumed that it was the purpose of the framers of the Constitution to vest in the National Government not only the power to acquire territory which it has so frequently exercised but also the power to dispose of territory, it would have been illogical to limit the exercise of these faculties exclusively to the treaty-making organ. The making of treaties of necessity implies the preexistence of two or more sovereign entities, capable of entering into such relations with each other. If, however, as the result of a successful war we were to conquer and occupy the whole of the territory of an enemy power and completely destroy its government, the annexation of such territory, if desired, would of necessity have to be accomplished by legislative action.

The creation of new sovereign entities by peaceful disintegration of greater political units is not an unusual phenomenon. The five existing Republics of Central America arose from the dissolution, by the Federal Congress, of the federated state of which they were formerly members.

The states which form the British Commonwealth of Nations, which are to-day autonomous communities, in no way subordinate one to another in any respect of their domestic or external affairs, have been recognized as such by the legislative organ of the Empire of which they were formerly mere colonial dependencies. The limitation of the power of relinquishment of sovereignty over unincorporated territory to the treaty-making organ of our Government would be a restriction based upon no logical distinction and would prevent its exercise, through the creation of new states, in the manner most compatible with the genius of our institutions.

The treaty-making power was said by the Supreme Court in Geofroy v. Riggs (133 U. S. 258, 267) to be unlimited "* * * except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the Government or any of its departments and those arising from the nature of the Government itself or of that of the States. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the Government or in that of one of the States, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter, without its consent * * *. But with these exceptions it is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country."

Doctor Willoughby (Constitutional Law, 1st Ed., vol. 1, p. 512) is of the opinion that the United States, through its treaty-making organ possesses "the constitutional power, in cases of necessity, to alienate a portion of or the entire territory of a State or States." The same reasoning, he says "* * * which supports the power of the United States as a sovereign power in international relations, to annex territories, is sufficient to sustain its power to part with them, even should the area parted with be a part of one of the States or include one or more of them."

If by this it is meant that such cessions may be made when required by pressure of superior hostile force, the correctness of the statement could not be disputed; but the author does not so limit the conclusion expressed. If such power does exist upon familiar principles the organ empowered to act would be the sole judge of the sufficiency of the necessity (Martin v. Mott, 12 Wheaton, 19). Obviously, if the power to cede territory within the States whenever deemed "necessary" by the treaty-making organ be conceded, its power to cede unincorporated territory could not be questioned; and the same reasoning would support the relinquishment of sovereignty by congressional action. This extreme doctrine, however, is not likely to command general assent.

The contrary view seems more persuasive, for as the paramount purpose of the Constitution is to create and maintain a "more perfect Union" than that which had existed under the Confederation, it is difficult to believe that it was ever intended to authorize the voluntary alienation of the territory of any State without its consent.

Whether the power of voluntary alienation extends in general to incorporated territory of the United States not within a State is open to much doubt. It could not have extended to the Northwest Territory, for the ordinance of 1787 had established that such Territory "should forever remain a part" of the Confederacy, and that it should ultimately be erected into States; and this existing engagement was one assumed by the United States under the Constitution (Art. VI).

As to territory subsequently acquired and incorporated but not admitted to statehood, it might perhaps be contended that the power to cede exists (Crandall, Treaties, ante, p. 23). The Supreme Court has used very sweeping language at times in its description of the scope of the power of Congress over the Territories. The fact, however, that the incorporated territory forms an integral part of the United States, the entity to which the unincorporated territory belongs, might well justify the contention that voluntary alienation of such incorporated territory, either by treaty or congressional legislative action, would constitute a partial dismemberment of the Nation, composed of all the people of the United States, contrary to the paramount purpose of the Constitution. The Government created by the Constitution is, in the exercise of the powers delegated to it, the agent of the entity, the United States, created by that instrument. The United States, as an entity, includes not only the States but all the territory which has been incorporated into it. In the Rassmussen case (197 U. S. 516, 520) the court, after pointing out that the insular cases turned upon the point that the Philippine Islands were under "* * * the sovereignty of the United States and were subject to its control as a dependency or possession, had not been incorporated into the United States as a part thereof, * * " held that Congress, by appropriate legislation subsequent to the treaty of acquisition, had accomplished (p. 523) the " * * incorporation of Alaska into the United States as a part thereof * * *."

Territory which by incorporation has become a part of the United States, although not admitted to statehood, is therefore an integral constituent of the Nation as a whole—of the entity to which the unincorporated territory belongs and for which the organs of the National Government act in the exercise of their delegated authority. In dealing with the unincorporated territory Congress acts not on behalf of the States which have been admitted to the Union but of the United States, the national entity, which includes all territory incorporated into it.

While from the standpoint of international law the United States as a national entity possesses the inherent power of cession of any part of its territory, whether incorporated or not, it may well be that from the standpoint of national constitutional law the organs of the National Government, save under the duress of exterior force, are without the power of voluntary alienation of territory within that part of the national domain which, in the domestic sense, constitutes the United States as distinguished from those unincorporated areas which belong to it. It may reasonably be contended that the grant of delegated powers, express or implied, and the powers resulting from the creation of a sovereignty, whether construed singly or by grouping, could not have been intended to permit the agent, by voluntary legislative action, or through the exercise of the treaty-making power—free from all elements of compulsion—to deprive the grantors of the delegated powers of the benefits of the political union which it was their purpose to create and maintain. That political union, as originally constituted, was not limited to the States. It certainly included the Northwest Territory, for the ordinance of 1787 declared and ordained that "* * * the said territory and the States which may be formed thereout * * *" should forever remain a part of the Confederacy of the United States of America. That territory, ceded to the Confederation by the States by which it was formerly claimed, became incorporated territory and an integral part of the United States, if not by the force of Article VI of the Constitution, then certainly by the reenactment by Congress in 1789 (1 Stat. 50) of the ordinance of 1787. As additional territory was thereafter acquired from time to time and incorporated into the United States, such territory after incorporation bore the same relation to the rest of the United States as had the Northwest Territory before the admission of the States formed from it. In all such territory the limitations upon the legislative power of Congress became operative ex propio vigore "as far as applicable" from the fact of incorporation (Alaska v. Troy, 258 U. S. 101). Such territories, whether "organized" or not, were regarded as embryo States (Shively v. Bowlby, 152 U. S. 1; Willoughby, Constitutional Law, 1st ed., Vol. I, p. 332).

These facts militate strongly in favor of the view that the paramount purpose of the Constitution to create a nation, composed of the people of all parts of the territory forming an integral part of the United States, constitutes a limitation upon the general power of cession resulting from the status of sovereignty. The existence of such a limitation is implied in the statement by Mr. Justice White in his concurring opinion in Downes v. Bidwell (182 U. S. 244, 317) that while the exigencies of unsuccessful war might require the expatriation of citizens of the United States, this could not "* * * justify the general proposition that territory which is an integral part of the United States may, as a mere act of sale, be disposed of."

These considerations, however, can not apply with respect to the Philippine Islands, which clearly are not an "integral part" of the United States but are merely territory belonging to it. The organs of the National Government are the agents of the United States, and the powers vested in them may reasonably be deemed to be subject to the "* * * restraints * * * arising from the nature of the Government itself * * *" (Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U. S. 258, 267); that is, that it was created by the Constitution to preserve the national entity, the United States, which that instrument brought into being; but as regards the unincorporated territory "merely belonging" to the United States, no such limitation can be said to exist. The people of the unincorporated territories, to which the Constitution does not geographically apply, are in no sense the source of any of the powers of Congress. In legislating for them Congress obviously does not act in any respect as their agent but as the agent of the people of the entity, the United States, to which the unincorporated territory belongs. With respect to such territory the Government of the United States, in the exercise of the resulting power of cession derived from the Constitution by reason of the status of the Nation as a sovereign State, is subject to none of the "restraints * * * arising from the nature of the Government itself," which might be urged against the contemplated cession or relinquishment of sovereignty over incorporated territory.

Expatriation: One objection frequently urged against the power of voluntary cession or relinquishment of territorial sovereignty over territory, incorporated or not, whose inhabitants are citizens of the United States, is that the effect of such cession would be the expatriation of such citizens. While it is believed that the power to cede or relinquish sovereignty over unincorporated territory includes the power to expatriate its inhabitants, the question does not arise with respect to the Philippine Islands, for their inhabitants are not citizens of the United States.

The power to dispose of territory as implied in the express powers to regulate commerce and promote the national defense: The power to dispose of territory, an attribute of sovereignty, is analogous and naturally correlative to the power to acquire it. It is not contended that the grant to Congress of the power to acquire territory necessarily implies, from the standpoint of our constitutional law, the possession by the National Government of the power to relinquish it; but at least with respect to unincorporated territory, belonging to but not forming an integral part of the United States, the possession by Congress of the power to acquire territory naturally inclines the mind to assume that the intention to withhold a power so important and necessary can not readily be imputed to the framers of the Constitution.

That Congress does possess the power to acquire territory by legislative act can no longer be open to doubt. It was by this method that the Hawaiian Islands were acquired. Doctor Willoughby (op. cit., Vol. I, sec. ed., p. 429) expresses the opinion that this action was constitutionally warranted by the same reasoning by which the guano islands act was upheld. He says it may also be justified upon the theory that the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands by joint resolution of Congress was "a necessary and proper measure for the military defense of the Nation and for the protection and increase of our foreign commerce. * * *"

This thought seems to have been in the minds of the Senators who approved the committee report favoring the annexation of Hawaii. (Willoughby, op. cit., sec. ed. note, pp. 439-430.) It has long been recognized that there are powers which can not be ascribed to any one of the express powers delegated to the National Government by the Constitution, but which may be taken as implied by a construction of two or more of the express powers, considered in the aggregate. In the legal tender cases (12 Wallace 457, 533) the court said that certain powers of the Federal Government not specified in the words of the Constitution or clearly traceable to any one of the express powers "may be deduced fairly from more than one of the substantive powers expressly defined or from them all combined. It is allowable to group together any number of them and infer from them all that the power claimed has been conferred."

Although the enumerated powers of Congress do not include the power to acquire territory by annexation or to withdraw the sovereignty of the United States by voluntary legislative action over unincorporated territory, they do include the power to regulate commerce and to raise and support armies and navies; and regarding these powers together it may well be, as suggested by

Doctor Willoughby, that they may be taken as authorizing the exercise by Congress of the implied power to annex territory when, in its judgment, the result will be to strengthen the national defense and extend and protect our national commerce. Congress possesses a wide discretion in the adoption of measures deemed by it to be appropriate to the accomplishment of the objects of government committed to its care. It has been held, for example, that United States v. Gettysburg Electric Railway (160 U. S. 668, 681) that a grouping of the express powers to create and equip armies and navies and to levy taxes for the general welfare justify the exercise of an implied power of eminent domain to acquire by condemnation land upon which to erect monuments commemorative of heroic deeds of the national military forces. Such action, the court said, tends to enhance the respect and love of the citizen for the institutions of his country, and therefore is valid because "germane to and intimately connected with and appropriate to the exercise of some one or all of the powers granted. * * *"

The selection of the particular means by which a constitutional power, express or implied, may be exercised by the National Government pertains to the discretion of the department in which it is lodged. The multiple activities of the Federal Government, carried on as manifestations of the power to regulate commerce and to maintain armies and navies, are familiar to all students of our legislative and judicial history. If, as Doctor Willoughby suggests, the power to acquire territory by congressional legislative action may be referred to these powers, as constituting a means by which commerce may be promoted and our armed forces made more effective, it would seem that by a parity of reasoning Congress would have power to release the sovereignty of the United States over unincorporated territory if it should find that, due to changed conditions, the retention of such territory would retard the development of commerce and militate against the effectiveness of our armed forces.

The disposal clause of section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution: It is vigorously asserted by Judge Williams (12 Va. Law Rev. 1, 8–10) that the power of Congress to cede or relinquish sovereignty over the Philippines can not be predicated upon the disposal clause in section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution. By this provision Congress is given "* * * power to dispose of and make all needful rules respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States. * * *"

Justice Malcolm (Philippine Constitutional Law, p. 179) and Doctor Willoughby agree that the proper construction of the word "territory" in the cited provision would make it a synonym of the word "lands" and limit the application of the disposal clause to rights enjoyed by the Nation as the owner of property in the Territories subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, as well as in the States of the Union.

At the time the Constitution was adopted the only Territory—using the word in its political sense—subject to the jurisdiction of the United States was the Northwest Territory. As this territory was permanently incorporated into the United States, it must be admitted that the cited clause was not intended to confer authority upon Congress to alienate sovereignty over it; and if the opinion of the majority in the Dred Scott Case (19 Howard 1393) were to prevail, this section of Article IV would have to be regarded as functus officio for all purposes, for the Chief Justice and his associates held that it was intended to apply only to the Northwest Territory and could not be regarded as a source of power to govern after-acquired territory.

This view was contrary to that entertained by Chief Justice Marshall, who, in the early case of Sere v. Pitot (6 Cranch 332), with the concurrence of his associates, expressed the opinion, with reference to the Territory of Orleans, that even were it to be doubted that the power to govern is implied in the right to acquire territory, it could be predicated upon the grant to Congress of the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory belonging to the United States. This opinion he repeated in 1828 (American Insurance Co. v. Canter, 1 Peters 511) with reference to the government of Florida, which, until admission to statehood, was, he said, to continue to be "* * * a Territory of the United States, governed by virtue of that clause which empowers Congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States * * *"; although he suggested that independently of this provision the power to govern might be derived from the power to acquire territory.

It is true that in 1840 the Supreme Court, upholding the power of Congress to authorize the President to lease mines in the Indiana Territory, said (United States v. Gratiot, 14 Peters, 526, 537) that the term "territory," as used in the cited section of Article IV, is "merely descriptive of one kind of property; and is equivalent to the word lands." But in 1853, in a case concerning territory acquired from Mexico (Cross v. Harrison, 16 Howard, 164), the court invoked this provision of the Constitution as a source of the power of Congress to govern acquired territories.

Decisions subsequent to the Dred Scott case show that the court did not consider that the question had been settled definitely. In Church of Jesus Christ v. United States (136 U. S. 1) the court held that the power to govern "Territories of the United States is * * * general and plenary, arising from and incident to the right to acquire the territory itself and from the power given" by section 3 of Article IV. In Downes v. Bidwell (supra) Mr. Justice White, concurring, said (p. 290):

"* * * In some adjudged cases the power to govern locally at discretion has been declared to arise as an incident to the power to acquire territory. In others it has been rested upon the clause of section 3, Article IV, of the Constitution, which vests Congress with the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the United States."

It is obvious, therefore, that there is authority for the opinion that even were the theory of implied powers of Congress to govern territory as the result of its acquisition to be rejected, that power could be granted upon section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution.

If the word "territory" means only land as property, it could hardly be assumed that the power to make all needful "rules and regulations" respecting it would imply the authority to set up the complicated governmental machinery which Congress has from time to time provided for our Territories. The manner in which the power has been exercised implies that it was assumed, if the cited provision of the Constitution was looked to as its source, that the word "territory" was to be construed in its political sense. Suppose that there had not been a square foot of public land in Porto Rico or the Philippines—no "territory" whatever in the limited sense of land of public ownership—would that have been an obstacle to the erection of such governments as those which exist there to-day? Obviously not. The powers of government have been exercised as though the word "territory" in section 3 of Article IV had precisely the same meaning as it has in the eighteenth amendment in the phrase "in the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof." As there used it has been construed (Cunard Steamship Company v. Mellon, 262 U. S. 101, 122) to denote "the regional areas—of land and adjacent waters—over which the United States claims and exercises dominion and control as a sovereign power." At the time of the adoption of the eighteenth amendment the term "United States" had been defined judicially to mean the States and the incorporated Territories. The insular possessions had been declared to be unincorporated areas subject to the sovereignty of the United States, belonging to but not an integral part of it. The phrase "the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof" was obviously worded in such a manner as to include the whole domain of the United States. Certainly it was not intended that the word "territory" should be construed to mean only places over which the United States has a mere proprietary interest. Nor is such meaning the only one of which the word "territory" in section 3 of Article IV is susceptible. On the contrary, the word "territory" is more properly used in the sense of domain subject to political sovereignty than it is as a synonym for land. The principal argument against understanding and applying it in this sense, in connection with the power of disposal contained in the cited provision of the Constitution, is that at the time of its adoption there was no territory of the United States from which Congress could have withdrawn sovereignty, because of the limitations due to the nature of the States and the permanency of the incorporation of the Northwest Territory. But if language used in the Constitution—in this particular instance the words "power to dispose of * * * territory * * *"—is broad enough to meet the requirements of an existing situation, must it be rejected because it must be assumed that the particular situation could not have been contemplated when the Constitution was adopted? In the Dartmouth College case (4 Wheat. 518) it was argued that the preservation of rights created by the grant of a charter could not have been in contemplation when the prohibition of the impairment of contracts by State legislation was written into the Constitution. To this contention the court, in the opinion written by Chief Justice Marshall, replied:

"* * * It is not enough to say that this particular case was not in the mind of the convention when the article was framed, nor of the American people when it was adopted. It is necessary to go further and to say that had this particular case been suggested the language would have been so varied as to exclude it, or it would have been made a special exception. The case being within the words of the rule must be within its operation likewise unless there is something within its literal construction so obviously absurd or mischievous or repugnant to the general spirit of the instrument as to justify those who expound the Constitution in making it an exception."

Can it be assumed that if the framers of the Constitution had been told that "the power to dispose of * * * the territory belonging to the United States" might in the future be construed as authorizing the relinquishment of United States sovereignty over an unincorporated territory on the other side of the Pacific, to enable its people to create a government of their own, upon the suggestion of this particular case the language would have been so varied as to exclude it? Is the contemplated construction one which is "obviously absurd or mischievous or repugnant to the general spirit" of the Constitution?

Henry Clay was obviously of the opinion that the power to cede territory was possessed by Congress under section 3 of Article IV of the Constitution—that opinion was the foundation of his opposition, and that of his supporters in the House (ante, pp. 6–8) in 1820, to the then pending Florida treaty; and this opinion is also expressed by Doctor Willoughby (Constitutional Law, 2d ed., Vol. I, p. 423), who says on this subject:

"* * * But the fact is that the Supreme Court, as will be later shown (Ch. XXV), has repeatedly and definitely committed itself to the proposition that this grant relates to political or jurisdictional rights of the National Government as well as to proprietary rights. It would seem, then, that, giving to the provision this political as distinguished from merely proprietary signification, it would follow that the power granted to Congress to 'dispose' of territory belonging to the United States implies not merely a right to sell the lands or other property of the United States but to release the political sovereignty of the United States over such territories by sale or cession to another power, or simply by withdrawing its own sovereignty and thus recognizing the independence and self-sovereignty of such territory."

Therefore, either upon the theory of resulting powers or upon that of the power of disposal under section 3 of Article IV, Congress is vested with constitutional authority to relinquish the sovereignty of the United States over the Philippine Islands and to permit its people to organize and establish an independent government.

CUSTOMS SERVICE

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I ask permission to place in the RECORD a letter that I have requested from the Commissioner of Customs showing the effect of the proposed 10 per cent cut in the Treasury bill on the Customs Service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF CUSTOMS,
Washington, April 25, 1932.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In response to the telephonic request of your secretary, I am pleased to submit herewith a statement which supplements the testimony given by Secretary Mills before the Senate Appropriations Committee with respect to the general cut of 10 per cent in the Treasury Department appropriations as contemplated by the McKellar resolution. In doing so, I wish to call your attention to the serious effect upon the Customs Service of any reduction in its appropriation for the fiscal year 1933 such as is contemplated by the recent Senate resolution which calls for a general cut of 10 per cent in Treasury Department appropriations.

As you well know, the Customs Service is and has been since its inception 143 years ago a revenue-producing agency of the Federal Government. Consequently, any reduction in personnel must of necessity, due to the nature of the service, be reflected in the revenue produced.

While business would cut its advertising costs, heat, rents, and other overhead expenses, it would not make inroads into its organization which would seriously cripple production.

The original estimates submitted by the Bureau of Customs for the fiscal year 1933 amounted to $25,518,400. Upon review by the Secretary of the Treasury, this estimate was reduced to $23,550,000—a reduction of $1,968,400. The Bureau of the Budget reduced this estimate an additional $500,000, and the House Appropriations Committee made a further reduction of $350,000, thereby bringing the customs appropriation for the fiscal year 1933 down to $22,700,000, or, in other words, a total reduction of $1,534,800 below the appropriation for the current fiscal year. Now, if a further cut of 10 per cent is added, as proposed in the Treasury Department-Post Office appropriation bill, it will mean an additional reduction of $2,270,000—thus reducing the appropriation for the next fiscal year approximately 15 per cent below that of the current fiscal year, which, in my opinion, would create a very dangerous situation.

There are at the present time 9,272 employees in the Customs Service, many of whom occupy technical positions requiring not only expert knowledge in their respective activities but years of training and experience as well.

This service has already been forced to reduce its personnel to the lowest number consistent with efficient administration as a result of the retrenchment order issued by the Secretary of the Treasury on May 6, 1931. Since that time vacancies have been filled only in key positions and other positions which were considered necessary for the absolute functioning of the service.

If a further reduction of 10 per cent is made, it will be necessary to dismiss approximately 1,100 employees from the Customs Service. Such action, however, will necessitate the closing of practically all interior ports and districts throughout the United States. Such action, as you know, would compel all importers of merchandise to clear their shipments at the first port of arrival in the United States and would practically eliminate the shipment of foreign merchandise in bond.

While I am in complete accord with the furlough proposal offered by the President, many difficulties will be encountered by the Customs Service even with this plan. For instance, there are 173 ports of entry throughout the United States where only one man is stationed; 52 ports at which 2 men are stationed; thirty-four 3-man ports, and nineteen 4-man ports; in other words, there are 278 ports of entry out of a total of 379 ports where less than 4 men are stationed at each port. Obviously the furlough plan can not be adopted at these ports, with the consequent result that the larger ports must carry the entire burden or many of the smaller ports of entry closed entirely.

To meet the proposed 10 per cent reduction it will be necessary to dismiss no less than 1,088 employees, thereby bringing the force down to 8,184 for the fiscal year 1933. At this point it is significant to note that in 1911, a time when the Customs Service did not function in connection with the enforcement of the prohibition laws, aircraft laws, narcotic importing and exporting act, and various other laws since written into the statutes, the Customs Service comprised 8,324 individuals.

The prevention of the smuggling of liquor, narcotics, and other contraband has added tremendously to the work of the organization, with the consequent necessity of assigning almost one-fifth of its entire force to this work alone. Notwithstanding this fact, the proposed reduction will compel us to reduce our organization to the extent of 140 employees below that of 1911.

I wish to point out further that due to the inflexibility of the Customs Service, it will be necessary to distribute this cut throughout the entire organization. For instance, the entire liquidating force, including liquidators in comptrollers' offices, entry clerks, examiners, verifiers-openers-packers, and other classes of employees would have to be reduced.

While there are approximately 270 employees in the seven comptrollers' offices whose annual salaries aggregate one-half million dollars, these employees have year after year changed or increased liquidations to the extent of several million dollars, thereby resulting in a direct addition to the revenue. Any reduction in this force must necessarily reflect in the ultimate production or revenue to the Government.

After urgent and earnest appeals by American manufacturers and dealers several years ago, a dumping unit was created for the express purpose of preventing the dumping of foreign-made goods in the domestic markets at prices ruinous to industry and trade in this country.

This unit will likewise suffer a reduction in personnel which can not fail to have a serious effect upon American trade and industry.

During the past fiscal year, examiners of merchandise as a direct result of their activities were responsible for an increase in the revenue to the extent of $5,370,226. This item covers additions to invoice value made as a result of the various examinations of merchandise and advance in rates.

There are 248 examiners in the Customs Service at an average salary of $3,335 per annum.

On the basis of the amount recovered to the revenue through these employees' activities ($5,370,226), it is proper to say that each individual examiner was responsible for increasing the revenue to the extent of $21,654. Deducting the average salary per examiner from this amount, the net profit to the Government upon its investment amounts to $18,319 for each man.

If a 10 per cent reduction is made in this force, it will be necessary to dismiss 25 examiners. While this reduction will save in salaries $83,375, the Government will at the same time lose in recoveries $541,350. Consequently the net loss to the Government would amount to $457,975.

The human destruction wrought by the illicit drug traffic is universally known, as is the fact that this traffic is supplied by smuggling.

As a direct result of the organization into searching squads of additional personnel authorized during recent years, more thorough examination of vessels has been made and definite progress in stamping out narcotic smuggling accomplished.

In the fiscal year 1928, 160 seizures of narcotics valued at $363,549 were made by customs officers; in 1929 there were 136 seizures valued at $482,781; in 1930 there were 142 seizures valued at $126,417; and in 1931 there were 196 seizures valued at $253,340, and aggregating the staggering amount of 66,674 ounces of drugs.

On April 6, 1932, customs searchers at New York examined an apparently legitimate shipment of toys which arrived that day from Europe on the French liner Ile de France, and, in addition to toys, found in this case 1,865 ounces of narcotic drugs. This seizure was made solely through the initiative of customs searchers.

A cut in personnel through reduced appropriations will necessarily fall upon the searching squads and the avenue for narcotic smuggling will again be opened.

For some time past it was realized by administrative heads in the Bureau of Customs that the force of customs agents was inadequate to efficiently cope with the increasing smuggling operations carried on by organized rings—particularly with respect to watch movements, narcotics, and liquor—in addition to the regular routine investigations relating to undervaluations, dumping, drawback, port examinations, etc. Representations were made therefore to the Secretary of the Treasury when the customs estimates for 1931 were being prepared for submission to Congress that with an increased personnel of 50 agents the expense involved would be offset many times over by accompanying additional recoveries. Provision was made, in fact, in 1931 estimate for an additional force of 50 customs agents, but to date only 30 of the authorized number have been appointed.

With this additional force of agents it was possible for the investigative unit to concentrate more on major investigations—that is, to keep agents employed continuously on particular investigations for weeks and months, whereas in the past it was necessary to handle such cases in routine fashion. The results that accompanied this increase in force during 1931 more than justified the representations made by the bureau heads, as shown by the fact that the $4,687,701 recovered as the result of the agents' activities in 1931 exceeded by $2,054,544 the amount recovered by them in 1929, and exceeded by $2,201,292 the recoveries from such source during the fiscal year 1930.

Under the contemplated cut of 10 per cent in the customs agency allotment for 1933 it will be necessary to reduce its personnel by 16 to 20 agents—so that the benefit derived from increasing the force to its present strength will be entirely dissipated—and will materially affect the efficient functioning of this branch of the customs work during the ensuing fiscal year.

It is also significant to note that the proposed tax bill which is now pending before the Congress carries various tariff items involving rates on oil, lumber, and coal, and also contains a provision for compensatory duty on commodities purchased on a depreciated currency basis. A tax is also contemplated on copper, with an intricate compensatory duty rate on manufactures of copper.

If this bill becomes law, additional work will necessarily be imposed upon customs officers, not merely one class of employees but inspectors, weighers and gaugers, samplers, entry clerks, liquidating clerks, examiners, and others. The depreciated currency provision alone will add a considerable burden to appraising officers and liquidators, as this new law will undoubtedly give rise to many highly technical questions.

I also wish to call your attention to an item contained in the proposed economy bill which eliminates the payment of overtime to customs employees.

Under the act of February 13, 1911, as amended by the act approved February 7, 1920, the master, owner, or agent of a vessel or vehicle for whom the services are rendered is required to pay this overtime. Therefore the continued payment of this overtime will in no way affect Federal funds, the only result of this provision being to deprive employees of overtime pay.

I also wish to point out that if this general cut of 10 per cent is made, it will most certainly give relief to bootleggers, rumrunners, racketeers, and every other class of lawbreakers, as the doors will be opened wide for all sorts of illicit traffic.

In closing I wish to add that the Customs Service has functioned during the past 143 years, and notwithstanding the fact that precarious times have been met in the past and several panics endured, this will be the first time in its history, if this 10 per cent reduction is made, that the service has been called upon to drastically reduce its force to meet a financial situation.

Very truly yours,

F. X. A. EBLE,
Commissioner of Customs.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
Chairman Subcommittee in Charge of Treasury Department Appropriation Bill, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

REPORT OF THE MILITARY AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Mr. CAREY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2434) for the relief of Edgar H. Taber, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 594) thereon.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

As in executive session.

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. HEBERT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of E. Coke Hill, of Alaska, to be district judge, district of Alaska, division No. 4, to succeed Cecil H. Clegg, whose term expired May 18, 1930.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. FLETCHER:

A bill (S. 4474) granting a pension to Frank T. Douglas alias Lewis Calhoun; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH:

A bill (S. 4475) for the relief of the Sanford & Brooks Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. TOWNSEND:

A bill (S. 4476) for the relief of the Hamburg-American Line; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HATFIELD:

A bill (S. 4477) to encourage the utilization of farming opportunities by certain destitute or unemployed persons; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts:

A bill (S. 4478) authorizing the appointment and retirement of Francis Joseph Thomas as an ensign in the United States Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. FRAZIER:

A bill (S. 4479) repealing certain sections of the Revised Code of Laws of the United States relating to the Indians; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. BARKLEY:

A bill (S. 4480) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to deliver to the custody of the Woman's Club, of the city of Paducah, Ky., the silver service in use on the U. S. S. Paducah; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 4481) granting a pension to Alexander Steele; and

A bill (S. 4482) granting a pension to Daniel Wilson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 4483) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1902, and amendments thereto; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 4484) granting a pension to Anna Saunders (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HOWELL:

A bill (S. 4485) to amend the agricultural marketing act, approved June 15, 1929, as amended; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 11290) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REVENUE AND TAXATION—AMENDMENTS

Mr. HOWELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 10236, the revenue and taxation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 243, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following new section:

"SEC. —. There is hereby imposed upon energy sold by privately owned, operating electrical power companies a tax equivalent to 3 per cent of the price for which so sold, payable from net income but not otherwise."

On page 243, line 25, after "article," insert "(other than electrical energy)."

Mr. ODDIE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 10236, the revenue and taxation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 233, between lines 2 and 3, insert the following:

"(d) In addition to any other tax or duty imposed by law, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all goods, wares, articles, and merchandise mined, produced, manufactured, or produced or manufactured, wholly or in part, from materials any of which have been mined, produced, or manufactured in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, or in any territory subject to its jurisdiction or control, imported into the United States, a tax of 50 per cent ad valorem based on the American selling price of such or similar domestic articles as defined in section 402 of the tariff act of 1930."

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3580) for the relief of Clara E. Wight.

RETURN OF SENATE ENROLLED BILL NO. 3584

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying enrolled bill, ordered to lie on the table:

To the Senate:

In compliance with the request contained in the resolution of the Senate of April 22, 1932 (the House of Representatives concurring), I return herewith the bill (S. 3584) entitled "An act to require all insurance corporations formed under the provisions of Chapter XVIII of the Code of Law of the District of Columbia to maintain their principal offices and places of business within the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 25, 1932.

THE WORLD COURT

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD an editorial which appeared in the Louisiana Times-Picayune of March 19, 1932, entitled "World Court and Senate."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

WORLD COURT AND SENATE

That hardy perennial issue, American adherence to the World Court, was taken out of storage last Wednesday and briefly examined by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. The merest preliminary investigation uncovered "new complications" whose untangling may keep the committee busy for the rest of the session. The resolution of adherence, embodying the Root protocol, is still exposed to diverse interpretations. One of the committeemen insists that further reservations must be attached to safeguard "American rights."

This particular Senator, we believe, opposes adherence on any terms. But his argument impresses a proadherence confrère, who proposes that all doubts regarding the meaning and effect of the resolution be cleared away before the committee reports it. The method of clarification, as he outlines it, involves diplomatic correspondence with the other Governments holding World Court membership, to ascertain if they "agree that the protocol does not impair or affect the fifth reservation, and that the court can not, without the consent of the United States, entertain any request for an advisory opinion touching any dispute or question in which the United States has or claims an interest."

This diplomatic correspondence, if the anxious Senator's motion therefore is seconded by the committee and the Senate and undertaken by the State Department, should consume a good many weeks or months. Pending its completion, the Senate course would hold the matter of American adherence in abeyance—thus automatically shelving it for duration of the present session.

Another method of attaining the same objective—further delay—is proposed by a third committeeman. He suggests that consideration of the whole matter be postponed until the Geneva conference on disarmament completes its work and the American delegates thereto return and report on the prospect of international cooperation and the European state of mind. The Senate has a representative of its own on the Geneva delegation; the motion to await his counsel on the subject of adherence might set the further indefinite delay in the gracious light of a "senatorial courtesy."

Neither of these suggestions was adopted by the committee at Wednesday's sitting. Its members did not consider it advisable, perhaps, to shelve the question too abruptly. So they invited Secretary of State Stimson to give them his views on the protocol at a later sitting. This gesture toward further consideration probably is intended to pacify those adherence advocates outside Congress who are demanding action. But few or none of these will be so easily deceived in the face of the abundant indications that the Senate—whether or not a majority favors adherence—is as reluctant now as ever it has been in the past to meet the issue and settle it.

LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a speech of Hon. R. C. P. Thomas, judge of the Warren County (Ky.) Court, delivered before the Association of County Judges held in Louisville, Ky., on April 8, 1932, on the subject of Local Self-Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The speech is as follows:

I was requested to discuss some phase of county government. The printed program, owing to a typographical error, gives my subject as "The function and treads of county government," when the subject selected is "The function and trends of county government," and while it is my purpose to call your attention especially to the county as a governmental unit, you may conclude before I have finished that the "Treads of county government" may not have been a misnomer after all. For in this motor age, the treads of county governmental tires have been worn quite smooth, blowouts are constantly occurring and county governments are parked on the highway of centralization. The odor of gasoline and the hum of the motor has increased the cost of local rural government to such an extent that the county as a governmental unit in many States of this Union is gasping for breath and local self-government is making its last stand before it may be numbered with departed glories. Unless heroic remedies are applied and our people see the light, the greatest aspiration of the human heart in government will be annihilated, the county and the minor governmental units sink into oblivion and local self-government, the shibboleth of our colonial ancestors, lost to us forever. Mr. Jefferson said, "It is not by the consolidation of powers but by their distribution that good government is effected. Were not this great country already divided into States, that division must be made, that each might do for itself what concerns itself directly, and what it can so much better do than a distant authority. Every State again is divided into counties, each to take care of what lies within its local bounds; each county again into townships or wards, to manage minuter details; and again every ward into farms, each to be governed by individual proprietors. It is by this partition of cares, descending in gradation from general to particular, that the mass of human affairs may be best managed, for the good and prosperity of all."

Stated in another way, each individual should be left to work out his destiny and be unhampered only where it is for public good and to perform all the duties of citizenship within his power of fulfillment, and like again those beyond his power and within the power and province of the family should be left to the arbitrament of the family, and those things in government beyond the power of the family should be left to a governmental unit—the town, ward, or township—and likewise powers beyond fulfillment of the aforesaid units should be left to the county, and governmental necessities beyond the fulfillment of counties should be passed on to the State, and those powers beyond the fulfillment of the State should be left to the National Government as delegated. The National Government should not encroach on any governmental functions which could be performed by the State, and likewise the State should not undertake to perform governmental duties which could successfully be performed by the county or other local governmental units.

In the early days of this country when the population was scarce, the boundaries of the counties were large, and counties few. As the population increased and settlements were established, the counties became more numerous so that the people by horseback or oxcart or foot could more easily reach their county seat of government. At the time the first constitution in Kentucky was formed in 1792 there were 9 counties in Kentucky; in 1799, when the second constitution was formed, there were 25 counties; in 1850, when the so-called new constitution was formed, there were 100 counties; and at the present time there are 120. The experience in Kentucky has been duplicated in most of the States of the Union.

During the past two decades and during the development of the motor vehicle distances have been wiped out, and increased costs of hard-surfaced roads have not only added increased burdens of taxation but many county governmental functions, including road building, have been taken over by the State, and the larger counties have been required to pay taxes and licenses to assist counties that have been unable to help themselves.

And when you scrutinize conditions not only in Kentucky but in other States, the evolution in motor transportation, with its attendant governmental expenses, has not only alarmingly increased county indebtedness but has left but little for the ordinary and customary county expenses. In New York there are 13,544 units of local government and approximately 10,000 school districts, one for every 20 farms. Taxes in many instances exceed the farmer's income, and the area of farm land in New York has shrunk 4,500,000 acres since 1880. In Michigan there are 83 counties, 1,269 townships, and 6,873 school districts. And these units elected 43,902 officers. In 1928 taxes were delinquent on more than 9,000,000 acres of Michigan land and on nearly a million village lots. Many States are similarly affected, notably Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, North Carolina, Georgia, Tennessee, and Kentucky.

It has been asserted that $10,000,000 of assessed valuation is necessary to maintain the simplest county government, and according to the report of the Kentucky State Tax Commission for 1930 there are 45 counties in Kentucky with a less assessment for State purposes than $10,000,000. Ninety-nine counties of the State have less than $20,000,000 of property subject to taxation. Twenty-nine counties have less than 10,000 population and three with less than 5,000 inhabitants. Eighty-eight counties have less than 20,000 population. Twenty-five, or more than a fifth, of the counties cost the State approximately one-half million dollars more than the revenue they pay in, and are called pauper counties. Good business does not justify a county as a governmental unit of the State if it cost the State in excess of the revenue it pays in. These pauper counties are necessarily unable to provide a frugal local government, but become an annual liability on the income of the State to the extent of half a million dollars out of the revenues raised by taxes, to say nothing of road-building expenses to the State.

The areas of the various counties of Kentucky are very dissimilar and run from 69,760 acres to 498,560 acres, yet the difference in area does not affect the county governmental units as much as lack of taxable assessed valuation and lack of population. The evolution of the gasoline motor vehicle with its attendant speedier travel has obviated the necessity of smaller areas for county government, while the cost of hard-surfaced roads has placed it beyond the capacity of smaller areas to pay unless, perchance, the smaller unit has the assessed value of property to take care of the burdens imposed.

Many of the counties, including the large as well as the small, are now facing deficits or have increased their bonded indebtedness in many instances greater than their capacities to pay. It can be asserted truthfully the changes in transportation have so vitally affected the expenses of county governments that it seems that major governmental surgical operations in boundaries will have to be performed, and even drastic reductions in officers and employees of the county governments in the aggregate will have to be made to meet the changes which have grown up around them during the course of the past 20 years. The horse and buggy have been driven from the highway. The car and the paved highway have changed the old order, and it is expedient to make governmental machinery and methods responsive to the necessities of such change.

The remedy which has been frequently discussed by political writers in America, and has received the approbation of many prominent men, is to enlarge the area of the counties. I am, therefore, calling this association's attention to it so that its members may give it serious reflective consideration.

Rural life is demanding governmental service, health service, graded and high schools, and other governmental agencies which were common to cities. This increased service can not be obtained by small counties or counties where the taxes from assessed valuation of property will not justify it. Motor-vehicle transportation makes larger counties or units possible. In any event the so-called pauper counties should be attached to adjacent areas sufficient in boundaries and wealth which could support the governmental agencies and adequate school facilities.

In consequence of the increased burdens upon local governmental units, the State has been compelled to absorb many functions within the power and province of county government, and in turn, without the consent of local governments, but through legislative enactment the State placed expenses and burdens upon counties which for a long time were considered peculiarly the province and function of State government. The National Government has so assumed functions within the scope and province of the States that in nearly every field of governmental endeavor there has been such a trend of governmental absorption of power by the larger governments, State and National, that the arm of local governmental endeavor has been palsied and the average citizen looks more to his State government, and still more to his National Government for relief in government, whether it be from the ravages of storm, of drought, of floods, or of whatever calamity comunities may be suffering from.

This seeming lack of responsibility of local government and the demand of the people for larger appropriations for everything, as long as they were under the anesthesia of indirect taxation by the National Government, have caused governmental employees to be increased alarmingly and governmental expenses to mount higher and higher until at last we find a whole Nation prostrate, and additional sources of taxes demanded for the purpose of balancing the budgets of Nation, State, county, cities, and local taxing units.

Ex-President Coolidge, in a recent article, states that in 1903 National, State, and local expenditures were $1,570,000,000, of which the State local costs were $913,000,000; while in 1929, total governmental expenses, National, State, and local, were $13,048,000,000. The expenses of State and local governments jumped from $913,000,000 in 1903 to $9,116,000,000 in 1929. In 1930 the ordinary family of five persons, directly or indirectly, was called upon to contribute to the Nation, State, and local units on the average of $416.05 yearly.

It staggers the imagination. The trouble is that local government was lost sight of and it did not matter if the money seemingly came from afar. The people did not realize that at last they were paying it. The farmers constitute about one-fifth of our population in the Nation and if we had dreamed that out of every dollar the farmer was receiving in income he was paying one-fourth of it to his governments and all classes were paying one-fifth of every dollar, I do not believe this drunkenness in government expenditures would have continued so long.

We are suffering from the decadence of local self-government. And the centralization of power has removed the government too far from the scrutiny of the individual citizen. The absorption of functions of the county by State and Nation, whatever have been the impelling causes, have brought havoc and ruin.

The present boundaries of counties in the State do not fit the changed conditions. If local self-government is reestablished, the county boundaries must be changed and enlarged to meet modern conditions and instead of having 120 counties in Kentucky 50 counties would suffice. Overhead expenses would be materially diminished, and under proper constitutional changes, duplications in government could be eliminated and efficiency in local government perfected.

These can not be accomplished without the people reaching the conclusion that great benefits would follow such a drastic change. The counties as at present constituted have been in existence a long time. Much sentiment has been built around them. The changes might have to come slowly. Efficiency in the county units as now established must first be brought about. Many things could be suggested, but officeholders and candidates for office where they might be affected usually fight changes, and they are usually organized. In consequence, duplicated agencies and activities of county government can not be eliminated because of opposition by the officeholders or candidates for office.

It is difficult to secure remedial legislation for county governments on account of the idea that offices exist for the officeholders and that an accounting for their emoluments is a matter in which the public has no concern. Duplicated agencies and activities in county government can not be brought about until the public mind is aroused over the benefits which will accrue to the taxpayer.

It is a hopeful sign that in many counties in this and other States taxpayers' organizations are being effected, conditions studied and programs promulgated for the benefit of the impoverished taxpayers. If the taxpayers, who have long been silent, will give serious study to the situation confronting counties and local taxing units, relief is in sight, but if not, local self-government will be annihilated and State and Nation will control all the activities heretofore carried out by local communities. As it is now, the county governmental agencies are without discretion, and with the multiplicity of legislative enactments are simply carrying out the mandates of State legislatures.

We must not accept centralization as the cure for the deficiences and nonefficiency of local governmental units. To trust all governmental functions to the National and State Governments would crumble the foundation on which our democracy is built.

Mr. Jefferson said, "We should thus marshal our Government into, 1, the general Federal Republic, for all concerns foreign and federal; 2, that of the State for what relates to our own citizens exclusively; 3, the county republics for all the duties and concern of the county; and 4, the ward republics, for the small, and yet numerous and interesting concerns of the neighborhood; and in government as well as in every other business of life, it is by division and subdivision of duties alone, that all matters great and small can be managed to perfection. And the whole is cemented by giving to every citizen, personally, a part in the administration of public affairs." And yet he was well aware that these subdivisions would be subject to change with changing conditions for he said:

"Let us as our sister States have done, avail ourselves of our reason and experience, to correct the crude essays of our first and unexperienced, although wise, virtuous, and well-meaning councils. And lastly, let us provide in our Constitution for revision at stated periods. What those periods should be nature herself indicates. By the European tables of mortality of the adults living at any one moment of time, a majority will be dead in about 19 years. Each generation is as independent of the one preceding, as that was all of which had gone before. It has then, like them, a right to choose for itself the form of government it believes most promotive of its own happiness."

CONSERVATION OF WILD LIFE

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I ask permission to insert in the RECORD a speech by Senator HARRY B. HAWES, delivered before the Tenth Annual Convention of the Izaak Walton League of America in Chicago on April 22d.

This speech deals with the investigations recently made by the Committee on Wild-Life Resources on the 4th, 5th, and 6th of April, presents some of the points developed in this hearing, and contains a suggestion for financing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

Mr. President, surveying the field of endeavor of those who have given generously of their time and money in the interesting effort to conserve and replenish the wild life of America, we find many splendid organizations, some of them purely local, others devoted to sectional and state-wide activities, and a few of national scope.

A volume might be written of the special efforts of the men and women who have given their very best to these associations. Besides these are those fortunate sportsmen who own their private preserves and clubs, but who, nevertheless, have taken a deep and unselfish interest in the subject and have spent liberal sums in investigation and experimentation and generously given to the public the benefit of improvements made by them.

Standing out conspicuously is that group which inaugurated the migratory-bird treaty with Canada and which since has attempted to extend its usefulness by a treaty of the same character with Mexico.

But of all these organizations and groups the one which seems nearest to me and more a part of myself is the Izaak Walton League of America, largely because I consider it what might be called a "grass-roots" organization; for it reaches into the smaller subdivisions of each State while at the same time it concerns itself with the larger problems of conservation in the individual Commonwealths and in the country as a whole.

My attachment to the league is also explained by the fact that I have to the best of my ability handled its problems of national legislation in Washington for a period of nearly 12 years.

And this has been for me an agreeable occupation. My early efforts were the occasion at times of some amusement, at others of some opposition because of a feeling that the vital affairs of the Nation were more important than its wild life, and that the time of the Senate and the House should not be devoted to what some of the Members thought in the early days were smaller and more trivial matters.

Fortunately, however, a conservation conscience has been slowly but surely developing. It was at first thought to be merely a matter of sentiment; but the thoughtful legislator has outgrown that opinion. He now realizes that conservation is part of the national program, involving as it does not only popular recreation but also problems of health and food, and the preservation for national purposes of the fine old frontier spirit of our ancestors.

The best efforts of the Izaak Walton League have been State efforts, but wherever it has concentrated upon some great national project, such as the upper Mississippi wild-life, fish, and game refuge, it has been signally successful; and it has generously and without jealousy supported movements of a national character initiated by other groups and other organizations. It has had the courage, on occasion, to disagree and condemn. Its democratic form of organization, its numerous chapters, and its large membership have given to it a political power greater than that of any other similar national organization.

It has been suggested that my remarks this evening be confined to a half hour's discussion of Federal authority and the Federal field in its relation to the broader field of activity. To understand the present situation a short statement of its causes seems necessary.

In our time of game plenty we made no preparation for its continuance. We permitted indulgence to blind us to the necessity of both the conservation and the restoration of wild-life resources. To-day we have reached the point of exhaustion and must balance our National Budget in this field as in the field of Government finances.

In the early days there were early practices, even necessities, which accounted for the waste of that period. The pioneers used game for food. They had little time for sport. Their immediate descendants replaced the herds of wild animals with their domesticated flocks and herds. Wild fowl were replaced with domestic ducks and geese, upland game birds with domestic chickens and turkeys. The skins of wild animals were replaced by leather made from bovines and sheep.

The wide open places were fenced; game cover was destroyed; swamps were drained; the rain water formerly absorbed into the land, thus forming a reservoir to prevent or minimize droughts, is now carried quickly away by artificial drainage to larger streams, causing floods, erosion, and the washing away of the fertile topsoil.

Into our streams and lakes and on the coasts of seas and gulfs we dumped the refuse of the Nation, and pollution of their waters followed. Dams and dykes stayed the migration of fish. Foreign species, like the carp, were imported. These destroyed our native game fishes.

The great demand for fish food by an increasing population always straining the supply stimulated the inventive genius of our people. The canoe, the rowboat, and the sailboat were replaced first by craft propelled by steam and afterwards by speedy boats driven by gasoline or electric power. All the hidden habitats of fish and game have been found; nets of great length and depth have taken the place of the shallow seine. Dynamite has been used, and whole rivers have been crossed by nets, destroying almost all species of water life. The banks of streams were denuded of trees and shrubs; erosion filled the bottom with a silt that generated poison gases. Drainage forced the waters into driving floods, destroying the spawn of fishes upon the shore and carrying breeding stock from their natural habitat to strange and unprotected places; aquatic plant life, food for the fishes, was washed away. The shade upon the banks is nearly gone. Everywhere the swift motor boat carries its party of energetic fishermen and hunters.

Our great forests are almost gone. The prairies are fenced and plowed; the mountains are burrowed with mines; the streams are polluted and dammed; the sky now has its observing airplane, and the telephone notifies the sportsman of the presence of both fish and game.

We are spending annually $650,000,000 in pursuit of fish and game and outdoor recreation, and it is costing more each year because additional thousands of our people are seeking health and pleasure in the open. This outdoor recreation is now a source of great revenue in many States and is increasing in importance in a large number of them.

Outdoor recreation saves health and restores it; it is a prime factor in promoting a healthy nation and giving to our children greater brawn, muscle, and longevity.

The outdoors has its spiritual side, with its communion with nature, its better understanding of God's wisdom, care, and beneficence, its teaching about plants, trees, animal, and fish life. All this adds to the experience of man, and for the child this instruction is vital.

The outdoors is less expensive than the hotel. It can be made as costly or as cheap as desired. It can be made to accommodate the pockets of all.

But outdoor life without the game birds, animals, and fishes loses its charm and attraction. It is like playing baseball without a ball, or like attending church without a sermon; like a dance without music, like an egg without salt, like a joke without laughter, or love without a kiss.

There are those who ride and ride and ride, who find in speed and movement in an automobile a satisfying diversion. There are those who are satisfied to do their shooting and their fishing with a camera, but their number is relatively small.

For those who do not use rod or gun we have saved the song bird and the bird of plumage, and for the farmer the insectivorous birds. Americans are turning their attention also to the gardens and the flowers so as to delight the eyes and the nostrils of these outdoor people.

But those who have inherited the instincts of the forebears (of the pioneer men and women) to enjoy the outdoors—and they are the vast majority—must have the chase, the conflict, the coordination of brain, eye, nerve, and muscle that gives the thrill, the real enthusiasm that comes with the strategy and skill required in fishing and hunting. In the absence of fish and game these incentives are gone, the desire disappears. Mechanics and an overcivilization put their death hand upon even mild outdoor adventure.

We have done so much and so well in many fields of science, comfort, sanitation, and education that it is strange we should have been guilty of such neglect of the wonderful natural resources which a wise and generous Providence has given.

To permit these to fail simply because we can not agree upon some practical, continuous, constructive plan or plans will be criminal.

It is true that to the extent of 80 or 85 per cent the problem is one for each individual State. Only the 15 or 20 per cent of it is of a Federal character. But this 15 or 20 per cent of it is vital part of the whole problem. It must be solved first, understood, coordinated. After that, it will be the easier of solution, the less expensive. Rightly directed, the program of solution will have the enthusiastic support of the sportsmen and women of the States. Accomplishment by Federal agencies will in turn stimulate State activity, furnish incentive, give advice and encouragement.

THE FEDERAL FIELD

We find in all the great nations of the earth that local custom, written into local laws, prevails. The response to local sentiment and opinion is seen in every form of government. Our Nation is a union of States which we have called the United States. The power of the national Government is limited and defined by our Constitution. It can not be extended farther without constitutional amendment.

During recent years, by various subterfuges and schemes for promoting projects, sometimes meritorious, there have been created bureaus, and commissions, through what might be called clerk-made laws. This bureaucracy has resulted in a great extension of Federal authority and activity. This is largely responsible for our billion-dollar deficit of to-day.

There is quite an obvious overlapping of national and State agencies, a duplication of effort followed by a duplication of costs. Business has become irritated; farmers are dissatisfied, and all thoughtful citizens (irrespective of the State or section from which they come) are opposing further increase of Federal activity with its lessening of State pride, State initiative, and local control. The old expression "States' rights" is more or less abandoned, but the resolve to preserve the State and the control of the State is now just as vigorously asserted in New England as it is in the States of the South.

I make this observation because, in asking for Federal aid or Federal control in the matter of saving and replacing our wild life, enthusiasts who are not fundamentalists or familiar with the psychology of the Congress sponsor proposals which are doomed to defeat in advance because these run counter to this opposition to further extension of Federal jurisdiction.

For illustration: The proponents of the recently introduced shell tax bill (H. R. 10604) proposed in their measure to give to the Secretary of Agriculture control not alone of migratory birds but of the administration and expenditure of money on upland game birds and fur-bearing animals. This was to be done by regulations, inhibitions, and plans issued by the Secretary of Agriculture. There were objections to the bill also because it sought for the first time to divest the Secretary of State of the treaty-making power and give it to the Secretary of Agriculture.

But the outstanding opposition, clearly and forcefully expressed by at least 95 per cent of the sportsmen's organizations and magazines of sport heard by the Senate committee in Washington on April 4, 5, and 6, was to the extension of power over the game departments of the States by a Federal bureau.

I call attention to this national psychology which will, in my opinion, prevent the domination of State departments by a single national department, and I recommend that all future proposals shall not only keep in mind the national feeling on this subject, but also the limitation of power possessed by the National Government in the field of conservation.

Federal activity, therefore, is confined exclusively, first, to its jurisdiction over the game and fish in its national parks and reservations; secondly, to its authority and direction over migratory birds, which for the purpose of this discussion is limited to ducks and geese; and, third, to its jurisdiction over navigable waters in the matter of fishes, limited even in this field by the shore-line rights of the States. While apparently this is a limited field, upon examination it broadens considerably and the utility and practical assistance of Federal control becomes at once a vital element, a necessary element, and an assisting force in State endeavors.

Before discussing what the Federal Government may properly do, a few figures as to the immensity of the subject may be illuminating. In 1931 approximately 5,300,000 fishing licenses were issued, including the combination licenses which number 4,500,000. Approximately 7,000,000 persons took out hunting licenses. Many States do not require licenses for individuals who shoot or fish on their own premises. The total who hunt and fish and pay a license for the privilege has been estimated at 13,000,000, approximately 30 per cent of our adult population.

According to figures of 1929, sporting firearms of a value of approximately $22,000,000, ammunition to the amount of nearly $43,000,000, and fishing tackle of various kinds approximating $25,000,000 were sold. Including in the sportsmen's equipment clothing, tents, boats, and various articles, it is estimated that the sports man and woman spends approximately $50 per capita a year. This, for those who take out hunting and fishing licenses alone, equals $650,000,000 annual expenditure. This excludes, of course, the cost of transportation and other items of expense, which, if added, would probably increase the outdoor bill to $750,000,000.

It is estimated that the Federal Government has an investment in national parks of nearly $55,000,000; in fish hatcheries of $3,500,000; in game sanctuaries between $2,000,000 and $4,000,000.

The States own approximately 44,500,000 acres of land and water which have been set aside as bird and game sanctuaries or reserves. Even at an average value of only $7 an acre, State reservations and sanctuaries are worth approximately $300,000,000. The aggregate, therefore, of investments which the Federal and the various State governments have made for the purpose of preserving or increasing wild life is about $507,000,000.

Our Committe on Conservation of Wild-Life Resources made the following recommendation in its report of January 21, 1931:

"(a) The Federal Government's part in connection with game crops grown on State land is to assist the States to work out better game-cropping methods. The Federal function is research and demonstration.

"(b) On Federal lands the Federal Government should conduct its own game-cropping operations."

We have classified game as follows:

Class 1: Farm game.
Class 2: Forest and range game.
Class 3: Wilderness game.
Class 4: Migratory game.

Time will not permit a detailed discussion of these various classifications, but they are interesting and will be found in the report.

FOR FEDERAL ACTIVITIES

"Pending specific recommendations for changes in existing laws, or a coordination of activities, our committee recommends concentration on the following subjects by the proper departments.

"1. Lend trained men to State commissions for aid in investigation.

"2. Lend aid to the States to organize demonstration areas.

"3. In cooperation with the States, place more of the national forests under game management. Work out cooperative plans for limiting and allocating the annual kill.

"4. Game management on the public domain.

"5. More wilderness areas—congressional recognition of areas for wilderness recreation.

"6. Fact finding in wilderness game species.

"7. Game surveys: Lend game experts to States wishing to reorganize their game program.

"8. Furnish game experts to agricultural colleges presenting satisfactory programs for game fact finding and extension work.

"9. Assist in perfecting an animal game census and to secure standardized reports from license holders of the annual kill of all varieties of game animals for the benefit of more efficient administration of both State and Federal conservation agencies.

GAME EXTENSION

"It is the custom of the Department of Agriculture to station at appropriate agricultural colleges experts in various biological subjects relating to domesticated plant and animal crops.

"Many agricultural colleges now desire to assume their natural function as technical advisers to State game departments and to landowners. The Department of Agriculture should cooperate with such colleges by furnishing men to assist them, both in game-research and game-extension activities.

"The National Government, through its Departments of Agriculture and Commerce, and through its bulletins, should advocate—

"1. A complete understanding between the farmer, the landowner, and the sportsman, in relation to game and fish.

"2. An increase in the number of State experimental farms.

"3. An increase in the number of State fish hatcheries.

"4. The systematic practice of game management on all publicly owned lands.

"5. They should conduct a scientific research and investigation into the causes of disappearance of wild life, the regional control of predators, the causes and prevention of stream pollution, bird, fish, and animal diseases and noxious parasites, and the subject of proper food and lack of cover.

"6. A national game survey by States.

"7. Cultivate a close cooperation between national and State efforts in the exchange of information and statistics.

"8. A report from the Bureau of Biological Survey on the best methods of breeding our native game birds.

"9. A report from the Bureau of Fisheries on the best methods of breeding our fresh-water fishes."

The committee found that—

"The necessity for coordination and cooperation between State enforcement and national enforcement is self-evident.

"Industrial developments and the rapid expansion of the American population in its manifold activities and occupations have made serious inroads upon the forests and other natural environments of wild life. The marsh and other areas so necessary to the maintenance of wild fowl suffered especially by this development. Tremendous acreages were drained, and in many cases the soil exposed by the drainage operations proved to be worthless for agriculture."

And that there should be a closer coordination of the activities of the Federal Government in administering wild life, reforestation, parks, and reclamation projects, it recommended a codification of Federal laws.

It is considering one great department of conservation, under which shall come a consolidation of Federal efforts for the preservation and replacement of both fish and game under the direction of either a new secretary or a permanent under secretary. Because of the many other duties imposed upon the members of this committee, it has not completed its investigation and determination on this particular subject, which seems to be most interesting to sportsmen's organizations.

Realizing that the present Congress, faced by a tremendous and extraordinary deficit, and the necessity of increasing our tax burdens by approximately $1,000,000,000 annually, and eager to reduce the cost of government some $250,000,000, it would be inappropriate and futile to expect the National Legislature under the circumstances to make enlarged appropriations for Federal enterprises in this field.

SENATE BILL 263

The committee finally prepared and introduced Senate bill 263, which is called the coordination bill, intending, without additional cost, to bring into cooperation every department of the Government which has either a direct or an indirect interest in this matter; and, strange to say, we discovered that not only the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, and Interior, but the Departments of Justice, State, Treasury, Post Office, Labor, War, and Navy all could do their part without additional cost, with some saving, and greater efficiency, through united effort.

With the passage of this bill millions can be saved in wild-life resources. The careless diversion of waters in one case on the North Carolina coast, the flooding of fresh waters with salt water, entailed a loss of millions of dollars. On the upper reaches of the Mississippi, by building nine dams instead of one huge dam, wild life and fish life will be conserved. When the Government in its solution of the flood problem of the lower Mississippi Valley begins its work of building great spillways, one approximately 100, and others 125 miles in length, and from 5 to 25 miles in width, attention should, and under the provisions of this bill must, be given to wild life.

The diversion of waters at one point in southeast Missouri involving 118,000 acres of land can in its way be utilized. This is true of all the great Government works, and especially is it interesting in connection with reforestation and the problem of erosion.

The enactment of the bill will be a valuable contribution to the popular welfare and impose no cost on the Government. It is now before the House committee, having passed the Senate by practically a unanimous vote.

THE MIGRATORY-WILD-FOWL NATIONAL HEARING

Three seasons of drouth and other causes inspired the Secretary of Agriculture to request an order from the President to limit the season to 30 days, cutting off two-thirds of the shooting season.

Many disputes arose as to the proper month to be employed. It provoked controversies, disagreements, and some bad blood. This reduction to one-third of the time allowed for shooting migratory birds had been preceded by a cut in the bag limit from 25 to 15 birds. There have been several proposals for raising money for the purchase of sanctuaries and the preservation intact of marsh lands and breeding places. The committee, therefore, deemed it advisable, in conjunction with its own investigation, to call to its assistance for its advice leading sportsmen, magazine writers, scientists, and game organizations.

Early in March it notified the public through the press that a hearing would be held on the 4th, 5th, and 6th of April, and that all were invited. A written request containing the following five inquiries was addressed to leading sportsmen and others:

1. To what extent is there a shortage in migratory waterfowl, particularly ducks and geese?
2. What are the underlying causes for this shortage?
3. What remedies can the Federal Government apply which will assist in restoring the migratory waterfowl population?
4. To what extent can the States assist in such a restoration?
5. How may the sportsmen themselves contribute to an increased migratory waterfowl population?

Seventy-two witnesses appeared in person. Twenty-eight others were unable to appear but filed written statements. The oral testimony alone covered 724 pages of typewritten matter. The briefs and exhibits, it is believed, will add another additional 600 pages, and the work when printed, it is estimated, will occupy over 600 pages of printed matter.

To digest this testimony, arrange it systematically, and draw conclusions of a probative character will require considerable time and is not yet even half done.

Some of the witnesses did not confine themselves to the five questions and were permitted to enlarge on matters that seemed to be their specialty.

Practically all of the witnesses disagreed with the designation of 30 days and the distribution of months in their allocation to different States.

But the discussion was singularly free from criticisms of the United States officials in the Bureau of Biological Survey. Formerly, when a sportsman had an idle pen, he very often without careful thought, attacked these officials. Now, it is generally understood that they are doing the best possible under difficult circumstances in an experimental field, and with a very limited amount of money. Twenty-four effective game wardens to police 48 States is upon its face an absurdity, although this small number has produced fine results, principally in restricting spring shooting and the sale of guns. With excellent pamphlets ready for distribution and no funds with which to publish them, studies for colleges and universities ready for distribution and no representatives to deliver the lectures, lacking a great experimental farm, it is beginning to be generally understood that the Biological Survey and its competent executives need assistance rather than criticism.

Relying upon my recollection, and without having had opportunity to examine the transcript or digest it (so that any statement made by me now is subject to change of revision), may I be permitted to say that the evidence disclosed—

Question 1. That there is a shortage of wild fowl in certain sections of the country and that there are other sections in which this shortage is not apparent. There seem to be in some sections the usual supply of different breeds, but it was generally agreed that there is a shortage of the redhead, canvasback, bluebill, and gadwall—the choicest of birds. Apparently the black duck, pintail, and some other nondiving varieties are nearly as abundant as in 1930. The shortage is quite apparent in some sections and not observed in others. The coast-line flights seem to have suffered less than the valley flights, and because of the delayed winter the flights were later, sometimes coming after the season had closed.

Question 2. There was generally agreement that the draining of marsh land and swamps, the drying up through drought, the lack of rainfall, and the disturbances caused by these things in Canada, the big breeding ground, were responsible for the shortage.

Question 3. The universal consensus was that the purchase of sanctuaries and feeding grounds, stricter regulations, and better enforcement, accompanied by closer cooperation between States and Federal agencies, were the remedies to be applied.

Question 4. The State's part was to assist in purchasing these sanctuaries; to assist in policing them; to keep more accurate record of the kill; to gather more data as to the different species; to insure a more ethical education for the sportsman. Opposition was expressed by nearly all witnesses to any extension of authority by the Federal Government over upland game. There was practical unanimity that its activities should be limited by the authority it possessed under the migratory-bird treaty, exclusively to migratory birds.

Question 5. How shall Federal money be raised with which to purchase sanctuaries, breeding grounds, and rest places, and provide for an extended personnel for Federal enforcement? The old plan of a dollar Federal license fee was generally advocated. The almost unanimous indorsement of this plan was remarkable. "More Game Birds" presented in an effective way, with charts and illustrations, its plan for the cent-a-shell tax, but it seemed to stand alone. The cent-a-shell tax plan was opposed by the American Game Association, the officials of the Izaak Walton League, National Trapshooters Association, National Skeetshooters Association, National Riflemen's Association, editors of sporting magazines, and State officials.

The plan for the cent-a-shell tax was an entirely unselfish, sincere, and earnest proposal to procure an additional Federal revenue, but objections to it seemed to mount as each new witness appeared. These objections may be summarized briefly, as follows:

1. It would give the Secretary of Agriculture indirect control over 48 State commissions.

2. It would place a burden upon the trap and skeet shooter whose shells are not used in killing game.

3. It would create unnecessary boards and bureaus and would not be confined to the specific subject of migratory birds.

There were other general objections to putting the Secretary of Agriculture in the business of making treaties with a foreign nation (a function which belongs to the Secretary of State), for the purchase of lands for sanctuaries in Canada, where we should have no legal right to make purchases. The awkwardness of the machinery and the uncertainty of the revenue which might be diverted by an act of any Congress found general expression.

In addition to the dollar-a-year license plan and the cent-a-shell tax plan there was suggested the issuance of Government stamps to be purchased by the migratory-wild-fowl shooter and attached to the State license, providing in this way a revenue dependent upon the sale of the stamps but without involving an extension of Federal authority or Federal regulation over upland game birds or over State administrations.

In addition to the sportsmen who appeared, the manufacturers of guns and shells gave their testimony. The manufacturers stated that the adoption of the tax would curtail their business from 25 to 33⅓ per cent; that they employed 12,000 persons in 1929; at the present time this employment was reduced to 8,950 persons. Estimating that four persons are dependent upon the employment of one workman, in a normal year 60,000 persons would be affected, and in the present year 44,750 persons; that in normal years their sales of arms and ammunition were about $40,000,000, and during 1931 approximately only $25,000,000; that the imposition of this tax (in addition to the 10 per cent tax proposed by the House) would reduce the volume of their industry down to $17,000,000 or $19,000,000 annually. They estimated that the tax would increase the cost to the jobber by approximately $10 per thousand. It was their opinion that the sportsman would not willingly pay an increase of $15 per thousand for his ammunition.

These manufacturers of guns and munitions are proud of their business and its practical contribution to one of the needs of war. They stated that in the last three years they had spent $300,000 in assisting conservation and replacement of wild life and had prior to that time expended for the same purpose from their own revenues approximately $1,000,000; that they were anxious to solve the problem and do their part, as they had not only a sporting interest and a conservation interest, but a very practical business concern in the saving and replacement of game.

So we found the subject approached from nearly every angle, and I believe the hearing will be profitable to the Nation, profitable to the sportsmen, and instructive to the States.

Until the testimony is read and digested, our committee of five Senators can not decide upon any definite recommendation.

What I have had to say here is personal, my own impression; but throughout the discussion there seemed to be practical unanimity regarding two things:

1. Restoration of the old spread of 90 days from October 1 to January 15, with a curtailment of either 45 or 60 days in between these two dates; the exact allotment of time to be determined by the game officials of each State in cooperation with the Biological Survey. The broad spread and the narrower spread to be determined on the basis of recommendations made to the Biological Survey by State officials.

2. It seemed to be also generally agreed that in any national financing project the burden should be borne exclusively by those who enjoy the privilege and the pleasure of shooting migratory birds; that it would be unjust to extend the cost of a license or a tax upon shells to the sportsmen who find their relaxation and pleasure in hunting the smaller animals and what has come to be known as upland game.

The point is illustrated by the game situation in Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania is a restocked State which annually issues over 800,000 fishing and hunting licenses. During the last year for which there is a report there were killed in that State 96,000 deer, 447 bears, 3,500,000 rabbits, 455,000 squirrels, 28,000 raccoons, 4,000 wild turkeys, 212,000 pheasants, 222,000 quail, 72,000 shore birds, and only about 45,000 ducks and geese.

Putting it this way: About 4,600,000 birds and animals were killed by hunters, and only 45,000 migratory birds.

So the united sportsmen of Pennsylvania, through their various organizations, protested most vigorously against the cent-a-shell tax.

A most interesting sidelight on the Pennsylvania situation is the appointment of 800 deputy game wardens who worked last year without pay. If paid, their compensation would have exceeded $400,000. I believe that men are readily available in all of the States of the Union for this voluntary work under direction of the State, and even in the matter of migratory wild fowl volunteers could be induced to enforce Federal regulations if they were supplied with a Federal badge and enrolled under the direction of Federal authority.

The matter of live decoys was discussed. There was an apparent difference between the use of the live decoy on the seacoast or the Gulf coast where ducks rafted a long distance from the shore during the day, come in only at night for rest or food, and the use of live decoys in inland waters of more limited areas.

Baiting with grain was condemned by some, approved by others. The planting of wild celery and other duck food was discussed.

In the course of the hearing there was an appeal by a lady that sportsmen should be more sportsmanlike, an amusing and interesting address. The Norbeck-Andresen bill, the upper Mississippi wild-life, fish, and game refuge bill, and other related activities of sport which divert money from the National Treasury were considered.

These investigations and Senate hearings have been instructive and cause me to make the following suggestions, merely for discussion, change, and revision:

OPEN SEASON

1. Limit the open season to either 45 or 60 days, between October 1 and January 15; bag limit 15; spring shooting prohibited.

2. Time to be uniform for all States. The exact date for each State to be determined by the Biological Survey after consultation with and upon the advice of the State game officials of each State.

3. The period to be agreed upon to be divided into hours (between sunrise and sunset); the hours of shooting, each day, or rest days, to be determined by the Biological Survey after consultation with and upon the advice of the State game officials of each State.

FINANCE

4. (a) Issue adhesive stamps of a denomination to be determined later ($1 or $2) to be attached to each State license if the holder wants to hunt migratory birds; provide penalties for shooting migratory birds without possession of such stamped license.

(b) The waterfowl preservation stamps to be sold at all post offices, or one post office in each county, and the proceeds to be administered by the Biological Survey, the cost of the Post Office administration to be deducted from the special administration fund of the Biological Survey.

(c) Approximately $1,000,000 annually to be applied to the purchase of sanctuaries, rest places, and breeding grounds for migratory birds.

(d) Approximately $250,000 for Federal enforcement, including the use of volunteer agents.

(e) Approximately $250,000 for administration, including experimentation, extermination of predators, study of disease, record of kill, changes of flight, publication, and experimental game farm.

IN GENERAL

Enlarge cooperation with Canada, renew negotiations for treaty with Mexico, divide administration into regional groups of States, organize volunteer Federal game wardens.

SOME ADVANTAGES

The suggested plan places the cost burden where it belongs—upon the man who shoots migratory birds. It preserves State control, it permits State advice as to time and conditions, sale at post office easily accessible, convenient with collection at minimum cost.

Game departments should be supported and are supported exclusively by sportsmen. They pay the cost of game administration. The nonsportsman, who does not contribute, is sometimes severe in his criticism.

The best friend of wild life is the man or the woman who carries a gun or a fishing rod. The game hog is fast becoming a sportsman outlaw. The professional pothunter is universally condemned and is now being punished.

When we put the gun upon the shelf for a number of years or the rod in the closet, they may not be taken up again, and thus many good and practical friends of conservation may be permanently lost.

There are well-meaning men and women who sentimentally discuss at breakfast the brutality of the hunters and the cruelty of the fishermen and urge that their recreation and sport be prohibited by law. They have for their breakfast, bacon or ham, which means that a pig's throat was cut for their benefit, possibly the throats of two pigs, one for the bacon, another for the ham.

At luncheon they have a chicken whose head was wrung for their benefit, or a duck whose head was chopped off to meet their desire.

Their dinner required a real slaughter, plenty of bloodshed, and the use of knives, hammers, and saws, so that they might enjoy themselves. A lamb chop signified that a little lamb has been killed for them, or a mutton chop that a grown sheep has been slaughtered. Or maybe they have veal, for which a calf died, or beef, for which a mighty steer was struck down. Or perhaps they prefer fish; so for their benefit a fish is strangled in a net, or suffocated, or frozen in ice to please their palates as they sentimentally discuss the horrors of hunting and fishing. Or perhaps they start the meal with oysters, crabs, or shrimp which for their entertainment are thrown alive into boiling water or frozen in a refrigerator.

Having attended to their appetites which called for the slaughter of chickens, ducks, lambs, sheep, pigs, calves, cattle, oysters, and fish, these critics of the sportsman's cruelty perhaps have honey for which the hives of bees have been despoiled; and continuing their discussion of the awful slaughter of wild things, they stretch themselves upon a chair or couch covered with a hide which came from an animal killed for them; and drawing a shawl of wool over their shoulders for which a sheep was sheared; or using a lighter garment of silk for which a thousand silkworms died, they rest their eyes and delight their nostrils with a vase of flowers which took from plant life its crowning glory—its bloom. The plant itself may have died for their delight.

But if a boy shoots a rabbit, or a man kills a deer for sport and food, these misguided people call them brutal, and they declare the killing of ducks or game to be a reversal to barbarism, and the catching of fish upon a hook they brand as cruelty.

These advocates are thoughtless in their criticism. They are unfair. They have no objection to the slaughter of birds and animals and fishes that are domesticated, but seem to draw a distinction between those that have been tamed and those that are wild. There is just as much brutality in killing the one as there is in the other.

There is, however, something virile, something strong, that has been transmitted to us in the blood of the forefathers, and I do not believe the ultra-sentimentalist will be permitted to prevail. Hunting and fishing will always be the favorite recreation of red-blooded Americans.

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF LEGISLATION—ADDRESS BY SENATOR CAREY

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] over a nation-wide radio hook-up delivered an address on Saturday, April 16, during the National Grange program, which I ask unanimous consent may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is being charged constantly that the legislation enacted by the present Congress has been for the benefit of big business rather than for agriculture. Some go so far as to assert that nothing has been done for the farmer. In answer to such allegations, it might be well to consider not only the legislation which has been passed in the few months that the Seventy-second Congress has been in session but also other legislation which is now pending.

One of the first measures enacted at this session of Congress was a bill to increase the capital stock of the Federal farm-loan banks. It provided for an additional capital of $100,000,000 to be subscribed by the Treasury, together with an appropriation of $25,000,000 to enable these banks to grant extensions on loans. The Federal farm-loan banks are largely dependent upon the sale of bonds to the public for funds to loan to farmers. The price of these bonds had depreciated on the market so that it was not possible for the banks to obtain additional capital except by selling bonds at a discount, which in turn would increase the rate to the borrowers to a degree greater than was contemplated or permitted by law. This measure, which was promptly enacted, should not only help the market for farm-bank bonds but has provided additional money to be loaned and also made possible numerous extensions of loans where farmers were unable to meet their installments.

Senate bill No. 1, although it was not the first to be enacted into law, provided for the creation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The act creating this corporation provided for an appropriation of $500,000,000 as initial capital, with a further provision that bonds to the amount of $1,500,000,000 could be issued, bringing the total capital of the corporation to $2,000,000,000. The act further provided that 10 per cent of the capital so subscribed should be loaned to farmers for feed for livestock and for crop production, including the purchase of fertilizer. Fearing that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation might not increase its capital to the full amount authorized by law, and in order to make certain that a sufficient amount would be provided for loans to farmers, a resolution was afterwards adopted by Congress which made available immediately $200,000,000 for loans to farmers.

The act creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation provided that loans could be made to railroads, insurance companies, banks, building and loan companies, and agricultural-credit associations. The making of loans to banks and insurance companies should be of indirect benefit to agriculture. A number of insurance companies have made a practice of loaning on farm mortgages in many of the States, many of which loans are in arrears. By granting credit to the insurance companies, it will permit them to carry many of these agricultural loans which would otherwise have to be foreclosed.

As to the banks, there has been a steady withdrawal of deposits. I do not believe that this is due so much to hoarding as some people claim, but rather through the fact that the income of everyone has been reduced, and consequently many have had to withdraw their savings in order to pay living expenses or to carry on their business. Further, in many sections the low prices which both agricultural products and livestock have been bringing has seriously reduced the amount of deposits which the banks would normally receive. This shrinkage in deposits has compelled banks to endeavor to make all possible collections from their borrowers. With the reduction of deposits, both in order to maintain their cash reserves and to render such service as possible to their customers, banks have been obliged to resort to rediscounting paper in constantly increasing amounts. The class of paper which is rediscountable under the Federal reserve act is very limited, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation furnishes an agency to rediscount paper which would not otherwise be eligible. On account of the great number of banks which are not members of the Federal reserve system, particularly in agricultural communities, these banks have made a practice of rediscounting with member banks, and in some instances the member banks had reached a point where they were unwilling to continue to handle paper for the smaller or nonmember banks. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation provides a means for the direct rediscounting of paper for banks that are not members of the Federal reserve system as well as the banks which are. This new line of rediscount facilities furnishes a source of credit designed not only to protect bank depositors but should make it possible for banks to carry their present loans and also to make additional loans.

While the law provides that loans should be made only on good security, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is permitting higher loan values than either the Federal reserve or Federal intermediate-credit banks. In connection with the livestock industry, I feel that these loan values will be the means of saving many a livestock producer from bankruptcy.

The Glass-Steagall bill, which was recently enacted by Congress, opens another great reservoir for the banks which are members of the Federal reserve system in that it temporarily permits the rediscounting of paper previously ineligible, and establishes for them another means of protecting their cash reserves. It is to be regretted that since the passage of the act creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, as well as the Glass-Steagall bill, there has not been the loosening up of credits that was hoped for previous to the enactment of these laws. While it is possible that some banks should not increase their loans, we have in this country many bankers who are priding themselves on the huge cash reserves they are maintaining, which in some instances may be justified. However, while I admit that the first duty of any banker is to protect his depositors, I feel that the banker has a positive obligation to go as far as possible in assisting his community in times of distress. While Congress has provided ample credit facilities for the banks, neither Congress nor any other agency of the Government can compel banks to make use of these facilities.

The intermediate-credit banks were created for the benefit of agriculture, loans being made by them to agricultural-credit corporations on livestock and on agricultural commodities. Money for loans by these banks is provided through the sale of debentures, which has been most difficult recently except at a price which would compel a high rate of interest being charged to the borrower; in fact, for a time it appeared that the interest rate to the borrower would have to be increased to 9 per cent. Under ordinary conditions the commercial banks have supplied a market for these debentures, but more recently these banks have hesitated to buy debentures for the reason that they were not rediscountable with the Federal reserve banks. A bill is now pending in Congress permitting these debentures to be rediscounted, which it is believed will reduce the interest rate to the borrower from 1 to 2 per cent.

Feeling that there has always been a lack of agricultural-credit corporations of sufficient size to take advantage of the facilities of the intermediate-credit banks and to make possible this source of credit to the farmer, Senator STEIWER, of Oregon, and I have introduced a bill providing for the establishment of 12 agricultural-credit corporations or banks. This bill provides for the establishment of one bank in each of the 12 Federal farm-bank districts, with at least one branch agency in each State. The capital of the proposed banks is to be not less than $3,000,000 each, with a 25 per cent surplus, which will make it possible to loan from four to five hundred million dollars on livestock and on agricultural products. While I realize that there will be opposition to this bill from some bankers, I can not help feeling that by furnishing credit facilities of this kind it will not only help agriculture, which is the primary purpose of the bill, but it will also be of benefit to the banks by furnishing additional capital in agricultural communities, especially in times like these.

While no legislation has been definitely decided upon, I have every reason to hope that before Congress adjourns some means will be found to remove from the American market a large part of the wheat and cotton which the Farm Board is now holding. It is generally agreed that unless these holdings can be taken off the American market they will continue to depress the prices of these commodities.

A bill was recently passed which relieved the settlers on reclamation projects from the payment of any construction charges which are due this year, and also allows a 50 per cent reduction of the charges for the coming two years.

Speaking of reclamation, I am well aware that an intensive campaign is being waged against reclamation, and I regret that much of it has been inspired by the head of one of the departments of the Federal Government. This official and his subordinates are constantly preaching to the farmers of the country that a further development of reclamation will add to the surplus of agricultural products and is a serious menace to the farmers of the Nation. But it should be borne in mind that if the Western States are to be developed, they must be permitted to make use of the waters of their streams, which waters are their most valuable asset. The crops produced by irrigation are as a rule not those which compete with agriculture in other sections of the country. In the Southwest the irrigation projects are supplying early vegetables in a market which would not otherwise be supplied. They are also producing a grade of cotton which is not competitive with the South.

On the northwestern projects the principal crops are sugar beets, alfalfa, and small grain. While we produce some cane sugar in the United States, most of our sugar is imported from Cuba and the West Indies; therefore it can not be charged with fairness that the production of beet sugar in the West is competing with the product of the American farmer.

As to grain and forage crops, these are used largely for feeding breeding herds, both cattle and sheep, during the winter months, which livestock in turn is marketed and sent to the feed lots of the East and Middle West, where the corn produced in those sections is converted into beef and mutton.

Representatives of this same department have stated on several occasions that the solution of the agricultural problem is the doing away of the so-called marginal farmer. Unfortunately I do not know just what constitutes the marginal farmer. He is certainly not the farmer of the West, where the land is productive and where it has not been exhausted by unwise farming methods. By what right can it be contended that the farm problem is to be solved by the destruction of farms and farmers. There is reason in preaching to the farmer the necessity of a diversity of crops and in prevailing upon him not to plant crops for which there is an overproduction but rather to produce those for which there is a demand. But I can not conceive how any farmer can increase his income by permitting his land to remain idle. There is never a moratorium on taxes and interest charges.

No one realizes better than I do that the measures which have been passed by Congress and those which are contemplated are not cure-alls for the ills of agriculture. The real trouble with agriculture is the price of agricultural products, and we will never solve the problem until we can devise ways so the farmers can receive a fair price for what they produce.

The reason that agriculture has never been on a parity with other industries since the World War is that we have devised no suitable way for handling the surplus. The attempt at stabilization by the Federal Farm Board has failed for the reason that the surpluses were greater than the board could handle. A constantly declining market has made stabilization impossible, and the results might have been different had it been attempted in prosperous times rather than when we were headed into a depression.

As to cooperative marketing there is no question but that it would be the solution of the farmer's difficulties in some lines of production, but there are other lines of agriculture to which it is not adapted. Further, cooperative marketing can not succeed unless the entire product of any commodity is controlled and sold through one cooperative. While it is possible that eventually the farmers of this country might be induced to pool their products, that time is so far in the future that it can not be considered as a solution of our present difficulties.

While every industry in the United States is suffering on account of the depression, agriculture is hit the hardest, and there is more reason than ever for hoping that some plan will be found which will put agriculture on a sound economic basis. I can say without fear of contradiction that there are few, if any, men in Congress who would not support legislation for the benefit of agriculture which they believed to be economically sound.

The present Congress has enacted legislation with the hope and thought that agriculture would be benefited. While this legislation will not solve the agricultural problem, there is no doubt in my mind, if these laws can be properly administered and that there is a proper cooperation in carrying out their purpose, that agriculture will receive its share of assistance with the other industries of the country.

DEPRECIATED FOREIGN CURRENCIES—LETTER BY MATTHEW WOLL

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, on April 1 I discussed the present tariff law and the question of imports and exports, and I referred specifically to the effect of depreciated currencies upon our commerce and trade.

On February 1 the distinguished senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] submitted a resolution which had for its purpose requiring the Tariff Commission to investigate and report the effects of depreciated European currencies upon our commerce. This resolution was amended by the able senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], so as to authorize a committee of the Senate, in addition to the authority given by the resolution to the Tariff Commission, to investigate this important question dealing with the individual welfare of the American people.

The greatest group which America possesses—the group, Mr. President, which reflects the welfare and prosperity of our land—labor—has become interested in this subject.

I send to the desk a letter written by the Hon. Matthew Woll upon the subject of depreciated currencies which is most interesting and impressive. I am quite sure it will be read with a great deal of interest by the public. To assure greater distribution of the letter, I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICA'S WAGE EARNERS' PROTECTIVE CONFERENCE,
New York City, April 25, 1932.

Hon. HENRY D. HATFIELD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: It is conservatively estimated that there are some 8,000,000 of America's industrial workers unable to secure any work. In addition there are upward of 2,000,000 additional who are working only part time.

We realize that we can not prevail upon employers to give these workers employment while conditions continue wherein employers know that they can not sell the product of American labor in competition in America with the products of foreign workers owing to price conditions, due to the depreciation of foreign currencies.

Further, we realize that employers will not produce articles which compete in the American market with the products of foreign workers when they know that similar or comparable articles can be purchased, the product of foreign workers, for less than the American costs of production.

We are not asking any change in tariff rates.

We contend that a national emergency exists; that the intent of Congress is being nullified through the importation of articles valued on the basis of the present depreciated foreign currencies; that the time for Congress to act is now.

We maintain that hundreds of thousands of additional American workers will be forced into idleness unless Congress sees fit to take prompt action.

We believe, and we respectfully request, that the Finance Committee or the Senate, incorporate in the pending revenue bill language which will make possible and mandatory the collection of customs duties by the Treasury Department as was intended by the Congress when the present tariff act became the law.

The depreciation of foreign currencies has made it possible for importers to secure the landing of the products of foreign workers in America at total landed costs far less than the American costs of production, something which was not intended by any Member of Congress when the present tariff act was enacted.

We believe that the Treasury Department should be directed to add to the declared import value the percentage of depreciation in foreign currencies prevailing and that customs duties should be collected on the basis of such value.

Action similar to that which we have suggested has already been taken by several foreign countries, notably Canada, France, Germany, and Spain.

Trusting that we may be favored with your support and that you may be able to prevail upon the Finance Committee, or the Senate, to comply with this request of labor and thus help American workers retain or secure additional employment.

Sincerely yours,

MATTHEW WOLL, President.

INVESTIGATION OF NEW YORK STOCK EXCHANGE

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an able and instructive address made over the radio on the evening of April 22 by the distinguished senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee. This address deals with the investigation of selling of stocks on the New York Stock Exchange.

The Senator, as chairman of this committee, has rendered valuable service, as usual, and I believe this address merits the attention of the Members of Congress.

The manipulation of stock and bond deals on the exchange and the underwriting and sale by banks of seventy billions of new stocks and bonds to gullible investors from 1920 to 1930 marks an epoch of abuse of trust that ought to be investigated by the Department of Justice and the postal inspectors for violations of the criminal statutes. These institutions created by law, by these practices, threaten the life of the Government that created them by undermining the confidence of their victims in the Government.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and it is as follows:

It will take the American people a generation at least to pay the cost of the Great War—$20,000,000,000 and interest—but the loss to the American public in the shrinkage of stocks and bonds on the exchange is two, three, or four times as large. I believe the market was sent entirely too high by manipulation. The innocents were caught. I believe the bear raiders are now depressing the market to their own gain. The Senate of the United States has decided that the Committee on Banking and Currency shall investigate the stock market to determine the evil practices with a view to correcting same.

A generation ago only a few stocks were listed on the market. Property was owned by individuals, not by corporations. To-day the reverse is true. The average man or woman in the eastern section of the United States now owns very little property except as shares in some big corporation, or bonds on same, and these shares and bonds are being manipulated up and down to the great loss of those who actually own same. I believe that owners of shares should be protected by law, the same as the owners of a home, a farm, or a town lot; they are not so protected now. If your property is in the form of stocks or bonds, a manipulation of the market may make you poor in a day, even though you are not a speculator. If the market practices had been more fair and the investor had been protected, there would not have been such a severe depression; there would not have been so much unemployment. Now, don't cheer, for the Exchange is powerful and they don't intend that anybody shall interfere with their game.

Every day I see men from New York who know the market, who know the ins and outs, and the ups and downs. They know the methods used to rob the public. They are perfectly willing to talk about it, but insist their names must not be made known. They say the "system" will get them. They will be ostracized; their credit will be curtailed. They will be driven out of business. They will be made bankrupt, and some actually go as far as to express fear of their lives. They tell me the "system" has so many ramifications. It is even claimed the Chicago gangsters are interested in certain manipulations. It has a string on so many people that it has friends in every place, high or low. The number of manipulators is small. The lambs are many. In this game, the ninety-nine have no chance against the one—the wolf.

SENATE COMMITTEE DIVIDED

Even the Senate committee is divided. One Senator took the side of the bear raiders; he claims "thar ain't no sich animal"—as the man said when he first say a giraffe at the circus. Another Senator is quoted in the newspapers as saying he does not favor regulating the stock exchange by law. He does not think Congress should interfere with this institution or its practices. He shares the views of the exchange—that all the regulating they need is to regulate themselves.

I am happy to say, however, that I believe a majority of the committee are for a real investigation, both of the bulls and bears—no matter who gets hurt by it, for they believe in the end it will help to restore a better condition throughout the country. I believe a majority of the Senators consider it just as wrong to misrepresent the value of a stock or bond as to sell rotten eggs for fresh eggs.

This depression, resulting largely from manipulations, has made millions of men idle. Families are destitute. Suicides are common. Widows and orphans are the harvest. Should we stand idly by? It is admitted that more than 20,000,000 people—most of them heads of families—lost their savings when the boom bursted in 1929. Just think of it—20,000,000 families in the United States were affected by these losses—that is, only one-third of the population of this country escaped the direct effect, and they suffered indirectly.

In the spring of 1928, a year and a half before the boom bursted in Wall Street, the Senate Banking Committee recommended remedial measures, but it was impossible to get the approval of Congress. Even at that time stocks sold at fictitious values, but the public enjoyed the situation. Stocks were going up from day to day, they said. Why disturb such prosperity as that? Technical lawyers argued then, as now, that Congress had no control over the stock exchanges.

We got no support. All we could do was to make a report predicting disaster, and nobody wanted to read that. Bad news was not wanted. Our committee implored members of the Federal Reserve Board to prevent the use of that banking system for speculation. Such a wild orgy might have been prevented, but the board sat with their hands folded and drew their salaries.

The American people had forgotten that what goes up must come down. Stocks selling at $100 a share were paying 1 or 2 per cent dividends and still going up. Pools were formed on the Street for the purpose of boosting certain stocks. Supposedly reputable banking houses recommended stocks to the public; brokers sent out market letters emphasizing and overemphasizing these recommendations. The mail was filled with carloads of literature telling that this or that stock was going higher.

When the market had been driven sky-high by the bull element, operating through pools, and it was found it could not be easily sent higher, they promptly withdrew their support and down went the stocks again and again. The public did not know why; they had no way of knowing.

The operators on the market have information that the public does not have. They take advantage of that information, both in a bull market and a bear market. They fleece the public when the market goes up and they fleece the public when the market goes down.

One of the large bankers of Chicago truly said that this was the worst crap game in the country.

A return to prosperity is built upon the return of confidence. The confidence is lacking. The Street sold it out for cash. The lambs have been sheared and it takes time to grow more wool.

Ask me again what is the major cause of this business depression in the eastern section, and I repeat it is the manipulation of the stock market. It is not the only cause, but it is the main one.

THE FARM AND THE FACTORY

The West had a longer depression, due to the handicap placed against agriculture, being interference with the law of supply and demand. When the farmer's purchasing power was reduced, he bought less. The factory stopped and the laboring man found himself out of a job, though not knowing just how it happened.

You ask me, When will this depression end? It can only end when the average family has an average earning power, because then they will have a normal spending power. They will buy the products of the farmer and the products of the factory. Then there will be profits in business. Then the wage earner will save and he will put his money in the banks and strengthen the banks. The business man will have a profit and good times will again return—but when? Not until confidence is restored. This confidence can not be restored until the American people can be assured of a fair dealing in every American market—even the stock and bond market—yes; even on the New York Exchange.

It is not only the stocks that have been manipulated, the bond market has also been manipulated; not only the bonds of our factories, but the bonds of our railroads and our other public utilities. The bonds of our Government have felt the same pressure, and many have gone below par. The bonds of foreign Governments have suffered the most. The pools that sold them did not support them; they just loaded them on the public and on the banks for the profit there was in it for them. Bonds that have been sold at $100 each have since come down to less than $10. Profits were made in selling them to the public; profits are made in gathering them back in.

RECOMMENDED BY BANKS

A year ago we had one of the largest bankers in the country before the Committee on Banking and Currency. He admitted in his testimony that he had recommended the purchase of Anaconda Copper mining stock to the general public at $140 per share. It is now down to $5 or $10 per share, and this man wonders now why there isn't confidence—confidence in him, confidence in his bank, confidence in Wall Street, confidence in New York.

Can the public be blamed for the lack of confidence in our markets, lack of confidence in our institutions, lack of confidence in our Government, and lack of confidence in themselves?

A method must be found to prevent a repetition of this. Congress does not want to interfere with private business, but Congress may have to do that very thing.

The New York market boasts of its reform rules, and there are some that can fairly be called so, but often they are traceable to laws enacted by the State of New York to make certain practices criminal. The stock-market-reform rules come late, and are observed poorly after they have been adopted.

I maintain, however, that the New York Stock Exchange does not and can not reflect the true values of the securities which are traded thereon. As long as the natural and normal laws of supply and demand are denied and while a select group of powerful individuals can influence values to their own advantage, an honest and equitable exchange for the purchase and sale of securities can not exist.

For a generation at least a big cloud has hung over the land—the threat of centralized wealth. The bulk of the national income falls in very few hands. Their income is so enormous that it gains additional velocity every year, but no force has been so potent in the concentration of wealth as the extreme fluctuations in the stock and bond market—the boom and the bursting of the boom.

It is not only the stock market and the bond market, but similar bad practices exist in the commodity market. Wheat and cotton often go up or down without much regard to supply or demand. They fluctuate according to the will of the powerful operators. Traders prefer this kind of a market; they call it an active market, but it is sometimes so active that the farmer goes without pay for his labor and the workingman pays "what the traffic will bear." The middleman gets the bulk of it. But the present investigation is of the stock exchange. If better market conditions can be brought about, it will point the way to certain changes in the farmer's market also.

I feel the need of drastic revision of the stock-exchange practices. The buying public are entitled to full information; they do not have it now.

RIGGING THE MARKET

A pool is formed and a stock issue is taken on. Various methods are used in boosting such stock. It is misrepresented in many ways. You are advised that it has large earnings. You read the recommendation of well-known investment firms. You are even told by your bankers that it is good stock to buy. You receive market letters from New York brokers recommending it highly. It rises steadily and the manipulators profit greatly, but when they have sold it to the public, they have no more interest in it. Their support is withdrawn, the publicity ceases, the buying end of the slump starts.

BORROWING STOCKS

It is a common practice for the buyer to leave his stock with the broker. The broker is called upon by a bear raider who wants to break the market. For a consideration he lends your stock to the raider, who sells short; that is, he sells what he has not got, but he has borrowed some of it. He has options on more of it. He is fairly well protected. He starts out to destroy public confidence and to break its value. He succeeds and he profits immensely by that.

LACK OF INFORMATION

You will recall the recent Swedish Match Co. debacle. The firm name was Kreuger & Toll. It was after Kreuger committed suicide that the irregularities of the firm were discovered, among which were forged bonds on which they had secured credit.

Is it conceivable that all the selling that took place just before Kreuger's suicide was done by those who knew a great deal more about the situation than the buyers did?

Did they know what was coming?

Did they take advantage of the unsuspecting public and sell them that which they knew to be worthless?

The bear raiders are especially active now. They depress a weak market and ruin the value of other people's property. One witness before our committee admitted frankly that it was "pathetic" the way the public put their money into the stock market—and pathetic is the right word.

RADIO SPEECH OF HON. JOUETT SHOUSE

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask leave to have published in the RECORD a radio speech of Hon. Jouett Shouse, chairman of the Democratic national executive committee, delivered over a nation-wide hook-up of the National Broadcasting Co. on Saturday evening, March 26, 1932.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and it is as follows:

In to-day's papers President Hoover has issued to the American people a plea that Congress shall balance the Budget. With his argument in this regard all citizens, regardless of party, must be in hearty accord. It is not only desirable but patently necessary that the executive branch of the Government exert its full influence to see that the present chaotic condition of the fiscal affairs of the Treasury shall be righted and provision made whereby the credit of the Government shall be fully maintained, safeguarded, and strengthened in every proper way.

It must be a matter of regret to Mr. Hoover's friends, as it is a matter of deep moment to the American people, that he should have delayed so long in voicing his concern and in uttering his plea. If his statement had come two weeks ago, before action had been taken by the House of Representatives upon the bill introduced as a nonpartisan measure by the Ways and Means Committee, it would have helped those who were trying to fight the battle for a balanced Budget. Now it is issued after the House has wrecked the committee bill and after the legislative situation has been thrown into a state of such confusion and even chaos that the outcome is difficult to predict.

The appeal of the President calls for bipartisan support. Such support is obviously necessary to the passage of any revenue bill. Such support has been accorded important legislation attempting to deal with all phases of the threatening situation that confronts the country. The President's statement to-day is in marked contrast to the expression given out just after the House had defeated the sales-tax provision which was the most important section of the revenue act presented for consideration.

Following a call at the White House Thursday afternoon, Silas Strawn, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, told newspaper men of the President's comment on the action of the House that day. According to the Associated Press and other responsible news-gathering agencies, "Mr. Strawn said President Hoover was 'quite disappointed' at the defeat of the sales tax in the House. Strawn said Mr. Hoover had pointed out that many of the Republicans in the House had 'gone along' on the sales-tax plan despite its being a Democratic measure."

Regardless of the fact that the United States Chamber of Commerce is presumed to be a nonpolitical and nonpartisan body, it has been frequently accused within recent years of acting as the mouthpiece for Republican administrations. In the present instance, as in many other instances, Mr. Hoover chose to speak through the head of that body.

During the 48 hours that have ensued since the Strawn statement was issued no question has been raised as to its authenticity. There has been no White House denial in whole or in part. Therefore, that statement must be considered authoritative. It demands some clarification of the situation which now confronts the American people.

We have heard much these past several weeks from members of Mr. Hoover's Cabinet and from other Republican sources as to the effectiveness and the value of the so-called administration reconstruction program. We have witnessed repeated efforts by the administration and by Republican leaders to convey the impression that every measure passed by the present Congress to deal with the critical situation is an administration measure.

The bill which appropriated $125,000,000 to reestablish the impaired capital of Federal land banks, the bill creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the Glass-Steagall bill which made eligible to rediscount in the Federal reserve banks a vast amount of additional paper held by member banks, thus freeing bank assets to an extent that will provide the large additional currency needed—all of these have been heralded far and wide as administration bills. Each of them was handled by the appropriate committee of the House of Representatives in which the Democratic Party holds a majority. Committee indorsement of none of them could have been had save for the action of the Democrats of those committees. Passage through the House of Representatives and through the Senate alike could and would have been prevented except for Democratic votes. And yet all of them have been blithely listed as administration measures for which, according to Republican leaders and administration spokesmen, all credit must go to President Hoover.

But now we are confronted with the inescapable task of meeting a huge deficit created by this same Republican administration. We are faced with the necessity of passing a revenue bill which will provide the money with which to make up this Republican deficit and to balance the Budget in order to save the credit of the Government, and the measure designed for that purpose, unpopular as any tax bill is bound to be, is designated by President Hoover, speaking through the mouth of Silas Strawn, as a "Democratic measure."

Why the necessity for this legislation? First, the Hoover deficit; second, the failure of the Hoover administration when it had unquestioned control of both Houses of Congress to make any provision by way of additional revenues to cope with the situation which was already apparent.

There is no statutory provision compelling the Government to spend all the money appropriated. There is nothing in the Constitution forbidding economy until Congress shall have enacted an order to that effect. Actually every dollar now being cut so painfully from the Budget presented by the President could have been saved had the President directed his department chiefs so to do.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1931, there was a deficit of approximately $1,000,000,000. For the current fiscal year the deficit will probably exceed two and a half billions, an unheard of sum in peace time in the history of any nation. We are now struggling to meet a threatened deficit of a billion and a half or more for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933. The Seventy-first Congress with a large Republican majority was in session from December 1, 1930, until March 4, 1931. It passed the appropriation bills which created the present deficit. It did not make even the slightest attempt to take steps necessary to balance the Budget. That was left for the incoming Congress in which the Democratic Party had a majority in the House and a practical majority in the Senate.

During the spring, the summer, and the early autumn of 1931 Mr. Hoover was besought on every hand to call the Seventy-second Congress into extraordinary session. Daily the deficit was mounting. Daily the revenues of the Government were falling off. Daily the need of legislation to care for the situation was evident. But Mr. Hoover was adamant to the pleas and the demands that he should assemble Congress to deal with the crisis. The agencies of his administration went on spending the money which the Congress of his party had appropriated. Finally when under the provisions of the Constitution the new Congress convened last December it was faced with a fiscal situation staggering in its realities and even more staggering in its potentialities.

The Democrats organized the House as they had been instructed to do by the electors of the country. A Ways and Means Committee with a Democratic majority, without partizanship and imbued solely with the desire to meet as best it could the crisis in governmental affairs, set out to write a tax bill. The minority party was not excluded, as has been Republican custom, from consideration of the bill in its initial stages. The recommendations made by Mr. Hoover's Treasury Department were reviewed. The figures of that department, as in almost every instance where it has presented estimates to Congress, proved wholly fallacious. It was found necessary to enter upon new fields of taxation. The bill reported had the approval of both Republican and Democratic members of the committee. The national necessity was confronted without flinching. Now, unfortunately, Mr. Hoover, through his chosen spokesman, has seen fit to designate this tax bill required to meet the situation as a "Democratic measure," although the other reconstruction enactments which preceded it have been loudly acclaimed as Republican achievements. That is the spirit of nonpartisanship which the administration shows in a crisis for which it must and will be held responsible.

Speaking for myself, I regret deeply that the House of Representatives refused to agree to the sales-tax proposal of the bill. There is no form of taxation to the theory of which I am so much opposed as the sales tax. But the essential thing facing our people, of whatever class and wherever situate, is that the Budget must be balanced and the credit of the Government preserved. We must not permit a condition that will compel the Treasury to pay a high rate of interest on the extensive financing to be completed before the 1st of July. If we should, every outstanding bond of whatever class—industrial, State, county, or municipal—will suffer a terrific slump, and the effect of such a contingency upon savings banks and insurance companies is too obvious to require comment.

I voiced approval of the sales-tax section of the revenue bill only as a matter of dire necessity. I have been unable to see where the required revenues could be secured from other sources. Certainly the recommendations made by the Treasury Department would not adequately meet the deficit. Even the present bill as originally presented could hope to do this only if Congress cuts governmental expenses to the bone. And that undoubtedly is just as necessary as any other part of the program. But a revenue bill must be written. It must provide at least a billion dollars additional to the present revenues of the Government.

There is serious doubt whether the increases made by the House in income and inheritance taxes above those recommended by the Ways and Means Committee will yield anything like the sums which their proponents have suggested. Income taxes can not be levied unless there is income on which to pay, and with dividends suspended, with industry stagnant, with factories closed, with railroads on the verge of bankruptcy, with unemployment so widespread that 8,000,000 men or more are out of work, the sources of income are dried up. Furthermore, it may be easily possible that those still fortunate enough to enjoy large incomes will conclude that their investments must be transferred in major part to tax-exempt securities in order to avoid a rate of tax almost confiscatory in its nature.

I have deep sympathy with Members of Congress and others who feel bitterly upon the subject of a sales tax. Mistaken though I consider them in opposing this provision from which there seems to be no escape at the present time, yet I can understand their desire to explore thoroughly every other field of taxation in order to ascertain whether the required revenue can not be provided by some other method. Moreover, I have faith to believe that if convinced that the need can not be supplied from other sources, they may be willing to return to the plan of the sales tax as a last resort. A revenue bill must and will be written. The Hoover deficit must be met. The Budget must be balanced. The present session of Congress must face the situation. It must make the necessary provisions.

The country may censure some Democrats for not following Democratic leaders in such a crisis, but the country will not forget that Mr. Hoover's administration created the present deficit, that Mr. Hoover's administration and the Congress of his party when in power were unwilling or unable to attempt to cope with the situation, and that now Mr. Hoover, when Democrats are trying to do what his own administration should have done long ago, has sought, at a most threatening juncture in the fiscal affairs of the Government, to inject partisan bias into the public consideration of a measure which has been treated by Democratic congressional leaders in a spirit of broad-minded, patriotic service.

An adequate tax bill is more necessary to the preservation of the credit of the Government, more basic to the return of prosperity, than any of the so-called reconstruction legislation which has been passed. The gravity of the crisis can not be exaggerated. The seriousness of the situation can not be too fully emphasized. The consideration of a common country transcends any other factor. In that knowledge Members of Congress must agree to take the steps required, however drastic, however unpopular. The people as a whole must be willing to make any sacrifice, however severe, to sustain the credit of our Government. Partisanship must be forgotten. The deficit must be met. The Budget must be balanced.

PROPOSED TARIFF ON COPPER

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement by the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] with respect to a tariff on copper.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY HON. TASKER L. ODDIE, OF NEVADA, BEFORE THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON FINANCE IN SUPPORT OF A TAX ON COPPER IMPORTS, APRIL 19, 1932

Until recent years there has been an exportable surplus of copper produced in the United States, and the argument has been advanced that protection would result in little or no benefit to the industry. The marketing conditions in the copper industry, however, have undergone serious changes, with the price of copper the lowest in history, and much, if not all, of the copper production of this country is resulting in operating losses. These losses have increased and will continue to increase as the volume of production is lessened, and the copper-mining industry under these adverse conditions can not longer be expected to sustain production, even on the present reduced scale.

With the low cost of copper production in Africa and in South America and the low cost and protected copper production of Canada the American producers can no longer compete. Foreign-produced copper to-day is monopolizing to a large extent the domestic market at the expense of American copper producers.

For instance, Canada enjoys the benefit of the American market, especially as the costs of copper production are borne largely by the other metals recovered from copper ores. Furthermore, with a 10 per cent depreciation in Canadian exchange, Canada is in a still stronger position to take advantage of the American market. Depreciation in currency in other countries is and will continue to be a major factor in enabling foreign copper producers to continue to monopolize the American market, to the detriment of the American industry.

The copper industry in the United States is suffering not alone from the low price of copper. It should be remembered that nearly 35 per cent of all the silver produced in this country is derived from copper ores, and the fact that the price of silver has also been the lowest in history has contributed in no small degree to the reduced revenues of the copper-mining industry.

From a purely national standpoint the copper industry occupies a prominent economic position, and copper-ore resources are among this country's principal assets. To permit this industry to be destroyed and copper-ore resources to be wasted or lost entirely would constitute a national liability. To assist the copper industry over this crisis will not only conserve the Nation's copper-ore resources and the large investments which have been made in mines and plants but also will be beneficial in increasing the possibilities of employment.

The nonferrous metals, lead and zinc, are afforded protection in the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act of 1930, but copper stands alone on the free list. I come before your committee to support the amendment to H. R. 10236, which provides for a tax on copper imports of 5 cents per pound. Under the present conditions of low-cost production in foreign countries and depreciating foreign currencies, I do not believe that a 5-cent tax will result in prohibiting imports of foreign copper. A complete embargo would be necessary to afford the fullest protection to the domestic copper industry.

However, a 5-cent tax should afford producers of copper in the United States an opportunity to compete for at least 50 per cent of the domestic market requirements. On this basis, the amendment which has been introduced should properly be construed half protection and half revenue; and estimated on the basis of the imports of 1931, the revenue on 50 per cent of this amount would yield approximately $15,000,000.

This amount of revenue should be welcomed by those who are seeking ways and means to increase the income of the United States and to balance the Budget.

Unless this amount of protection is afforded to the American copper-mining industry, operations will still farther be reduced, adding more thousands to the present army of the unemployed. Copper-ore resources of the Nation will also be greatly diminished and the American consumers of copper will be largely at the mercy of foreign producers, who after monopolizing the American market will be in a position to dictate the price. I therefore urge upon the committee the importance of giving this matter most careful consideration, with a view of including the 5-cent copper tax proposal in the bill to be reported.

The bill (S. 268) to amend subdivision (c) of section 4 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended, was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1663) to prohibit the sending of unsolicited merchandise through the mails was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2642) to establish a commission to be known as a commission on a national museum of the engineering industry was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 76) authorizing the President to reorganize the executive agencies of the Government was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRATTON. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1856) to provide for the relief of farmers in any State by the making of loans to drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation, and/or similar districts other than Federal reclamation projects, or to counties, boards of supervisors, and/or other political subdivisions and legal entities, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

CHANGE OF NAME OF PORTO RICO TO PUERTO RICO

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 36) to change the name of the island of Porto Rico to Puerto Rico was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Whereas in accordance with all historical data relative to the discovery and colonization of the island known as "Porto Rico," the original name given thereto by its discoverer, and consecrated in the royal orders of the colonizing nation, was Isla de San Juan; and

Whereas the first city founded on Porto Rican soil, and denominated "Villa de Caparra," was given the name of "Ciudad de Puertorrico";

Whereas subsequently, and by virtue of the transfer of the old Ciudad de Puertorrico to the site now occupied by the capital city, the aforesaid names of "San Juan" and "Puertorrico" became the exclusive patrimony of such city and island, respectively; and

Whereas the history and traditions of the people have since then sustained and consecrated the name of "Puerto Rico," given to such island, as its sole name; and

Whereas immediately following the change of sovereignty which took place in the island, the Congress, without justifying reasons, officially give the island the name of "Porto Rico"; and

Whereas the aforesaid name of "Porto Rico" is an impure idiomatic compound partly formed of the word "porto," which, although of Latin origin, has not yet been adopted into the language of the island, but is here used illegitimately, as a substitute for the word "puerto," genuinely Spanish, although no license, reasons of diction, or advantages of euphony exist to warrant such substitution; and

Whereas there are no reasons either in the history, the language, or the traditions of the people of the island which support the use of the term "porto" as a part of the name of the island: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That from and after the passage of this resolution the island designated "Porto Rico" in the act entitled "An act to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1917, as amended, shall be known and designated as "Puerto Rico." All laws, regulations, and public documents and records of the United States in which such island is designated or referred to under the name of "Porto Rico" shall be held to refer to such island under and by the name of "Puerto Rico."

The preamble was agreed to.

BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2375) for the relief of Roscoe Meadows was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Let the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2914) to authorize appropriations to pay in part the liability of the United States to the Indian pueblos herein named, under the terms of the act of June 7, 1924, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2190) to amend section 300 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 15) to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals, in the State of Alabama, to authorize the letting of the Muscle Shoals properties under certain conditions, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. FESS. I ask that that joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

PROMOTION OF HEALTH OF RURAL POPULATION

The bill (S. 572) to provide that the United States shall cooperate with the States in promoting the general health of the rural population of the United States and the welfare and hygiene of mothers and children, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BINGHAM and Mr. MOSES asked that the bill be passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. JONES. I do not know whether there has been a unanimous-consent agreement entered or not with reference to the consideration of bills on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was no unanimous-consent order made, and bills are going over on objection.

Mr. JONES. We have reached this order on the calendar, and it has been objected to. When there is again a call of the calendar, on Monday next or earlier, I give notice that I shall then move, notwithstanding the objection, to take up the bill the title of which has just been stated. I shall not, however, do so this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will go over on objection.

BENEFITS OF HOSPITALIZATION AND PRIVILEGES OF SOLDIERS' HOMES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 4724) to confer to certain persons who served in the Quartermaster Corps or under the jurisdiction of the Quartermaster General during the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the China relief expedition the benefits of hospitalization and the privileges of the soldiers' bonus, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all persons who served in the Quartermaster Corps or under the jurisdiction of the Quartermaster General during the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or the China relief expedition on vessels owned by the United States and engaged in the transportation of troops, supplies, ammunition, or materials of war, and who were discharged for disability incurred in such governmental service in line of duty, shall—

(1) Be entitled to the benefits provided for by paragraph 10 of section 202 of the World War veterans' act, 1924, as amended; and

(2) For the purpose of receiving the benefits of the Soldiers' Home, the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and the Naval Home, be held to have been honorably discharged from the military or naval forces of the United States.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to whom the provisions of this bill apply.

Mr. REED. The bill applies to persons employed by the Quartermaster's Department on transports or supply ships in the Spanish-American War or the Philippine campaign or the China expedition and would give them the privilege of hospitalization under the World War veterans' act and the right to admittance to soldiers' homes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Was the passage of the bill recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. REED. No; the bill was not referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It was for some reason referred to the Committee on Pensions. This is a bill similar to one which passed Congress at the last session and was vetoed by the President, as I recall. It does not provide for any pensions whatsoever.

Mr. BINGHAM. Why was the bill referred to the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. REED. I presume because it was so ordered. I asked to have the bill referred to the Committee on Military Affairs when it first came on the calendar, but the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], who has the measure at heart, did not seem to want the bill to be referred to that committee. I imagine the bill will be vetoed if it shall pass.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PLAYA DE FLOR LAND & IMPROVEMENT CO.

The bill (S. 3477) for the relief of the Playa de Flor Land & Improvement Co., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed as follows:

Be it enacted etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the District Court of the Canal Zone to hear and determine, without the intervention of a jury, but subject to the provisions for appeal as in other cases provided by the Panama Canal act, as amended, the claim of the Playa de Flor Land & Improvement Co. against the United States on account of property taken by the United States in the Canal Zone.

ACTS OF INTERFERENCE WITH FOREIGN RELATIONS

The bill (S. 1058) repealing various provisions of the act of June 15, 1917, entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes" (40 Stat. L. 217), was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. BINGHAM subsequently said: Mr. President, earlier in the day there was passed over Senate bill 1058. I ask unanimous consent that there may be inserted in the RECORD at that point a letter received by me from Mr. Alexander Lincoln, president of the Sentinels of the Republic, and also a petition to the United States Senate from the board of directors of the Woman Patriot Corporation in connection with that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SENTINELS OF THE REPUBLIC,
Washington, D. C., April 21, 1932.

Senator HIRAM BINGHAM,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BINGHAM: Senate bill No. 1058, introduced by Senator WALSH of Montana, has been favorably reported by the Committee on the Judiciary without hearings.

The text conceals the far-reaching subversive provisions of the bill.

The Sentinels of the Republic ask that the bill be recommitted in order that its opponents be heard and that those officials responsible for the enforcement of the laws affected may be questioned as to the consequences should this bill be enacted.

Sincerely yours,

ALEXANDER LINCOLN, President.

A PETITION TO THE UNITED STATES SENATE TO RECOMMIT S. 1058 FOR PUBLIC HEARINGS

To the Honorable Members of the United States Senate.

GENTLEMEN: The United States Senate is hereby respectfully petitioned by the board of directors of the Woman Patriot Corporation:

1. That S. 1058, by Senator WALSH of Montana, a bill to repeal three sections of the United States Criminal Code (secs. 343, 344, and 345, title 18, U. S. C.) and one section of the National Defense Code (sec. 33, title 50, U. S. C.) and to amend the conspiracy section of the National Defense Code (sec. 34, U. S. C.), be recommitted for public hearings.

BILL MISLEADING—HEARINGS REFUSED—REPORT WORTHLESS

The text of S. 1058 in its misleading brevity deliberately conceals the vast scope of its subversive provisions.

Hearings on this bill were formally requested by opponents, December 16, 1931. But the bill has been reported out without hearings, with a report that gives the text of only one section out of the four it proposes to repeal—the one applicable "when the United States is at war"—whereas the other three sections it repeals "by the numbers" and without the text, are applicable in times of peace, part of the permanent Criminal Code, and are now available to punish violations of no less than 68 different laws of the United States, including treason, sedition, inciting insurrection in insular territories, privateering on the high seas, destruction or injury of vessels, interferences with judicial processes, foreign relations, and conspiracies against national defense.

This necessary effect of the bill is not mentioned in the report. And the refusal of hearings further proves the intention to hide the purposes of the bill. But the report contains a long, ex parte, and anonymous memorandum by advocates of the bill, which also refrains from giving the text of the three sections of the Criminal Code the bill repeals.

The three sections of the Criminal Code the text of which is not furnished the Senate in the report prohibit the used of the United States mails to violate 68 Federal laws, 36 sections of the Criminal Code, 16 sections of the Foreign Relations Code, and 16 sections of the National Defense Code, namely:

Criminal Code: Sections 25, 27, 31 to 38, 238, 381, 502, 611 to 633, title 18, United States Code.

Foreign relations: Sections 213, 221 to 223, 231 to 235, 238 to 245, title 22.

National defense: Sections 31 to 42 and 191 to 194, title 50, United States Code.

Of the 68 laws affected, 51 either carry no penalty, as administrative provisions, or a lesser penalty than the three sections of the Criminal Code which punish the use of the mails for their violation by fine of $5,000 or five years' imprisonment, or both. The text of these three sections is set forth hereafter (Exhibit 1). A list of the 68 sections of the code affected by S. 1058 is also set forth hereafter (Exhibit 2).

2. That in view of the fact that the 68 sections of law automatically affected by repeal of sections 343, 344, and 345 of the Criminal Code are of concern to the War and Navy Departments, the State Department, the Department of Justice, the Department of Commerce, and the Post Office Department, that the following officials may be called upon to testify as to how S. 1058 would affect the enforcement of the 68 sections of law relating to matters of national defense, foreign relations, judicial processes, shipping laws, etc., for enforcement of which those departments are severally responsible:

The Judge Advocate General of the War Department.

The Judge Advocate General of the Navy Department.

The Director of the Bureau of Investigation, Department of Justice.

The Solicitor of the State Department.

The Solicitor of the Department of Commerce.

The Solicitor of the Post Office Department.

3. That loyal citizens and organizations outside of the Government departments may also have an opportunity to be heard in opposition to this bill of 26 lines to cripple the enforcement of 68 laws, designated only "by the numbers" with one exception, in the report.

FALLACY OF "WAR MEASURE" AND "CENSORSHIP" CLAIMS

This bill S. 1058, although it affects 68 of the permanent laws of the United States included in the code under the act approved June 30, 1926, by repealing one "war law" and three laws prohibiting at all times the use of the mails for treason, seditious conspiracy, privateering plots, and many other crimes, is advocated merely as "repealing certain provisions of the espionage act" and as abolishing what the report calls "to all intents and purposes a censorship law"—without giving the text!

That is, matter in violation of 68 sections of the United States Code now being unmailable under the three sections of the Criminal Code that S. 1058 proposes to repeal, Congress is asked to make all this criminal matter hereafter mailable under pretense that otherwise there is a "censorship" by the Post Office.

There is, in fact, no more "censorship" in this case than in laws prohibiting use of the mails to sell lottery tickets, to transmit poisons, explosives, dangerous liquids, chemicals, and articles for immoral use.

These laws are all mandatory. There is no question of discretion whatever on the part of the Post Office Department. The matter is declared unmailable under severe penalty. It is simply a question of whether the law shall be enforced or nullified.

One might as well call other mandatory criminal laws a "police censorship" or the customs laws (prohibiting the entry of many articles) a "censorship" by customs officers or say that every prosecuting attorney exercises "censorship" in bringing charges before a grand jury.

This is not "censorship" in any case. If the law is violated, it is the mandatory duty of the postmaster, the policeman, the customs officer, or the prosecuting attorney, as the case may be, to proceed promptly against the offender.

"Censorship" gives some official or board discretion to approve or disapprove, to allow or disallow, certain things or acts in accordance with the opinion of the official or board. Here, on the contrary, there is only the issue of law enforcement.

Proof that "censorship" is not involved at all, but that S. 1058 is designed to do away with the mandatory statutes that prohibit the use of the mails for treasonable, insurrectionary, conspirative, and other subversive criminal plots—that may best be promoted on a large scale, of course, through the mails—is furnished by the failure of the report to cite the provisions of law alluded to as virtually a "censorship law."

Proof that repeal of these laws not only but their nullification while in force is urged by the so-called American Civil Liberties Union in the interests of revolutionary communist groups is contained in the letter sent out by the American Civil Liberties Union, February, 1931, in part as follows:

"Urge repeal of the espionage act: The House of Representatives still has before it bill S. 3416, which calls for repeal of the war-time espionage act. This bill was passed in the Senate last session. Write your Representative urging him to vote for it.

"Write also to Postmaster General Walter F. Brown, Washington, D. C., asking that he stop the drive on the radical press now being made under a section of the espionage act. Four radical papers have been barred from the mails for 'seditious language' and 'revolutionary advocacies'—the Revolutionary Age, the Young Worker, the Young Pioneer, and a Spanish weekly, Vida Obrera. The first is a weekly organ of the expelled 'majority (Lovestone) group' of communists and the others are official communist party papers."

There is proof not only that this bill (S. 1058), which is the same as S. 3416 of the last Congress, is urged on behalf of communists, but also that the American Civil Liberties Union is urging its members to ask the postmaster to nullify the law, pending its repeal, in the interests of revolutionary communists.

The three sections of the Criminal Code involved follow in full text:

CRIMINAL CODE SECTIONS REPEALED BY S. 1058—TEXT OF SECTIONS 343, 344, AND 345, UNITED STATES CODE, TITLE 18; 40 STAT. L. 230

"343. Certain letters or writings nonmailable; opening letters.—Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book or other publication, matter or thing of any kind, in violation of any of the provisions of sections 25, 27, 31 to 38, inclusive, 238, 381, 502, 611 to 633, inclusive, of this title, sections 213, 221 to 223, inclusive, and 231 to 235, inclusive, and 238 to 245, inclusive, of title 22, and sections 31 to 42 and 191 to 194 of title 50 is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter and shall not be conveyed in the mails or delivered from any post office or by any letter carrier; but no person other than an employee of the Dead Letter Office, duly authorized, or other person upon a search warrant authorized by law, shall be authorized to open any letter not addressed to himself. (June 15, 1917, c. 30, Title XII, sec. 1, 40 Stat. 230.)"

"344. Letters and writings advocating treason declared nonmailable.—Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book or other publication, matter or thing, of any kind, containing any matter advocating or urging treason, insurrection, or forcible resistance to any law of the United States is hereby declared to be nonmailable. (June 15, 1917, c. 30, Title XII, sec. 2, 40 Stat. 230.)"

"345. Using or attempting to use mails for transmission of matter declared nonmailable by title; jurisdiction of offense.—Whoever shall use or attempt to use the mails or Postal Service of the United States for the transmission of any matter declared by sections 343 and 344 of this title to be nonmailable shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both. Any person violating any provision of said sections may be tried and punished either in the district in which the unlawful matter or publication was mailed, or to which it was carried by mail for delivery according to the direction thereon, or in which it was carried to be delivered by mail to the person to whom it was addressed. (June 15, 1917, c. 30, Title XII, sec. 3, 40 Stat. 230.)"

CONSPIRACY SECTION AMENDED BY S. 1058—TEXT OF SECTION 34, UNITED STATES CODE, TITLE 50; 40 STAT. 219

"34. Conspiracy to violate preceding sections.—If two or more persons conspire to violate the provisions of sections 32 or 33 of this title, and one or more of such persons does any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, each of the parties to such conspiracy shall be punished as in said sections provided in the case of doing of the act the accomplishment of which is the object of such conspiracy. Except as above provided conspiracies to commit offenses under this chapter shall be punished as provided by section 88 of title 18. (June 15, 1917, c. 30, Title I, sec. 4, 40 Stat. 219.)"

The Walsh bill (S. 1058) repeals the three sections of title 18 above set forth—and thereby permits the use of the mails for violation of 58 other laws covered by section 343 and section 344—but this fact is not mentioned in the report. These are not "war measures" at all. They apply equally in times of peace—as does section 34 of title 50 set forth above.

Section 33, title 50, is also repealed by S. 1058—but the text of that law, which applies only "when the United States is at war" is set forth on the first page of the report on S. 1058, as it was in the report on the same bill, in the same way, when S. 3416 of the Seventy-first Congress, identical with S. 1058, was reported June 5, 1930. (See Rept. No. 831, Calendar No. 845, 71st Cong., and S. 3416, 71st Cong.)

HOW BILL PASSED SENATE IN 1930

S. 3416, identical with the present S. 1058, was passed by the Senate June 11, 1930 (permanent RECORD, p. 10484), without debate, and with 17 lines of explanation about "war measures" and the power of the postmaster to "throw out" unmailable matter. This was during a debate on the tariff, when many other measures on the calendar were being passed or passed over.

One Senator, Senator GEORGE, when the bill was read, said:

"Mr. President, I would like to have an explanation of this bill. I am not familiar with it. It seems to be an important measure."

Senator WALSH of Montana thereupon made the brief "war measures" and "censorship" explanation of 17 lines, and the bill was passed without a roll call, or any other discussion. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 11, 1930, p. 10484.) No action was taken on the bill in the House of Representatives. Hence the present "drive" to pass an identical bill (S. 1058) with an identical report, at the present session.

PART OF AMERICAN CIVIL LIBERTIES UNION SUBVERSIVE PROGRAM

This bill is part of the program which the so-called American Civil Liberties Union is interested "in putting through Congress" to "help lessen the weapons of repression in the hands of courts and Government officials."

The American Civil Liberties Union letter of March, 1932, lists it as a companion measure to several other radical measures it is backing, such as S. 3275 and H. R. 298, to admit aliens who refuse to bear arms to American citizenship and to "overcome" three decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States to the contrary; to S. 3907, "to abolish 1-man censorship by the Post Office Department" in regard to obscene matter, and to S. J. Res. 43 and H. J. Res. 179, "calling on the President to restore the rights of citizenship to persons convicted under the espionage act during the war for their pacifist utterances."

LAWS ADMITTEDLY NOW IN FORCE

While neither the report nor the anonymous ex parte memorandum accompanying it set forth the text of sections 343, 344, and 345 of the Criminal Code (title 18, U. S. C.), which S. 1058 proposes to repeal, nor the text of section 34, title 50, United States Code, which S. 1058 proposes to amend, the following significant admissions are to be found in the anonymous memorandum at page 3 of the report:

"This title in its original form not only remains in the body of our law but is not even suspended until the next war. It is now operative and ready for use at any time."

"By a series of decisions the United States Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of section 3 of title 1. Illustrative authorities are:

"Pierce v. United States (252 U. S. 239), 1920.
"Schenck v. United States (249 U. S. 47), 1919.
"Frohwerk v. United States (249 U. S. 204), 1919.
"In the famous Milwaukee Leader case (U. S. v. Burleson, 255 U. S. 407, 1921) the Supreme Court upheld Section XII."

Here is an inadvertent confession that all the propaganda to the effect that this bill is intended "merely to repeal" certain "war measures," applicable only "when the United States is at war"—as the report would otherwise indicate, by quoting only one out of the four laws it repeals, on the front page of the report, and the bill, by its recited purpose and arrangement—is for the purpose of "putting through Congress" a radical measure that could not easily be passed with full discussion of its ramifications, and consideration of the 68 different laws which the repeal of sections 343, 344, and 345 of the Criminal Code (title 18, U. S. C.) would allow criminals to violate through use of the mails without punishment for such abuse of the mails.

In considering S. 1058 the Senate should also have before it the 68 sections of law it affects, which may be listed as follows:

LAWS AFFECTED BY S. 1058

Section of U. S. Code	Prohibitive or administrative purpose	Penalty in statute
	TITLE 18, CRIMINAL CODE
25	Organizing military expedition against friendly power	$3,000 or 3 years.
27	Compelling foreign vessels to depart (Executive)	No penalty.
31	Enforcement of neutrality; withholding clearances	Do.
32	Detention of armed vessels (Executive)	Do.
33	Sending out armed vessel to belligerent nation	Do.
34	Statements required of masters of vessels (Commerce Department).	Do.
35	Forbidding departure of vessels (Executive)	Do.
36	Unlawful taking of vessel out of port	$10,000 or 5 years.
37	Internment of belligerents and allowing escape	$1,000 or 1 year.
38	Enforcement by land and naval forces (War and Navy Departments).	No penalty.
288	"Foreign government" defined, including unrecognized faction.	Do.
381	Violent interference with foreign commerce	$10,000 or 10 years.
502	Injuring vessel engaged in foreign commerce	$10,000 or 20 years.
611–633	Search warrant laws	$1,000 or 1 year.
	TITLE 22, FOREIGN RELATIONS

221	Unlawful use of passport	$2,000 or 5 years.
222	Forging, altering, etc., of passport	Do.
223	Passport control act	No penalty.
231	False statements to injure United States in foreign relations	$5,000 or 5 years.

LAWS AFFECTED BY S. 1058—continued

Section of United States Code	Prohibitive or administrative purpose	Penalty in statute
	TITLE 22, FOREIGN RELATIONS—continued
232	False assumption of diplomatic or consular office	$5,000 or 5 years.
233	Acting as foreign government agent without notice (State Department).	Do.
235	"Foreign government" defined, including unrecognized faction.	No penalty.
238	Seizure of munitions of war for export	Do.
239	Warrant for detention of property	Do.
240	Petition for restoration of property seized	Do.
241	Libel and sale of seized property	Do.
242	Method of trial	Do.
243	General extent of interference with foreign trade	Do.
244	Discretion of President to release seized property	Do.
245	Use of land and naval forces to prevent exportation	Do.
	TITLE 50, NATIONAL DEFENSE
31	Unlawfully obtaining information affecting national defense	$10,000 or 2 years.
32	Unlawfully disclosing information affecting national defense in time of peace.	20 years.
	Unlawfully disclosing information affecting national defense in time of war.	30 years or death.
33	Seditious or disloyal acts in time of war	$10,000 or 20 years.
34	Conspiracy to violate preceding sections	As in said sections.
35	Harboring or concealing violators of law	$10,000 or 2 years.
36	Designation of prohibited places (by President)	No penalty.
37	Places subject to provisions of chapter	Do.
38	Jurisdiction of courts-martial (War and Navy Departments)	Do.
39	Jurisdiction of courts of Canal Zone and Philippines	Do.
40	"United States" defined	Do.
41	"Foreign government" defined, including unrecognized factions.	Do.
191	Regulation of vessels in national emergency	Do.
192	Seizure of vessels failing to observe regulations	$10,000 or 2 years.
193	Destruction or injury of vessels	Do.
194	Use of land and naval forces to enforce provisions	No penalty.

It is to be observed that the majority of these 68 sections, including all those conferring powers on the President and the several departments as to neutrality, foreign trade, regulations of vessels, relations with foreign governments, and passports, search warrants, etc., and provisions for the national defense, either carry no penalty or a lesser penalty than the statutes S. 1058 proposes to repeal.

Only nine of these laws carry a greater penalty in the statute than that prescribed by section 345, title 18, United States Code, for using the mails to violate them.

Only three of these laws carry a similar penalty in the statute to that provided for using the mails to violate them.

All the others, if S. 1058 is passed, may be violated hereafter with much less risk or penalty if there is no penalty for using the mails to violate them.

The Federal Government for many years has accomplished various good purposes in promoting national defense and protecting its citizens from fraud, obscenity, and various other evils by denying the use of the mails or prohibiting the shipment in interstate commerce of various fraudulent or immoral goods.

It is well known that lotteries have been practically abolished merely by denying the mails to persons promoting such gambling schemes.

If such use of the postal power and the interstate commerce power is proper and constitutional—as the Supreme Court has uniformly held—to protect the American people against petty frauds and gambling devices sent to them through the mails, it is self-evident that for a greater reason the present statutes prohibiting the use of the mails for treasonable, seditious, and revolutionary schemes to overthrow the United States Government itself, and to arouse its citizens to rebellion and insurrection, should be continued in full force and effect.

Respectfully submitted.

BOARD OF DIRECTORS, THE WOMAN PATRIOT CORPORATION
MARY G. KILBRETH, Chairman.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 97) to protect trade-mark owners, distributors, and the public against injurious and uneconomic practices in the distribution of articles of standard quality under a distinguishing trade-mark, brand, or name was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the bill is to be taken up, it is certainly of sufficient importance to command an explanation for the benefit of the Senate.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I will not ask that the bill be taken up at this time. I shall, though, in the near future ask that time may be given for a proper consideration of the measure. It is one of very great importance and I am very anxious that it should be presented to the Senate in the regular way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 80) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish equipment, goods, and supplies to governors for use in aid of distressed citizens was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1155) to establish a board of indeterminate sentence and parole for the District of Columbia and to determine its functions, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRATTON. In behalf of the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who is absent, I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

SUIT BY TLINGIT AND HAIDA INDIANS OF ALASKA

The bill (S. 1196) authorizing the Tlingit and Haida Indians of Alaska to bring suit in the United States Court of Claims and conferring jurisdiction upon said court to hear, examine, adjudicate, and enter judgment upon any and all claims which said Indians may have, or claim to have, against the United States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that this bill was passed on April 11, and the action in passing the bill was subsequently reconsidered. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS FOR COLORADO SCHOOL OF MINES

The bill (H. R. 231) to grant certain lands to the State of Colorado for the benefit of the Colorado School of Mines was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue to the State of Colorado patent conveying title to the south half southeast quarter section 22; the north half northeast quarter, and the southwest quarter northwest quarter section 27, township 18 south, range 66 west, sixth principal meridian, Colorado, for the use and benefit of the Colorado School of Mines located at Golden, upon payment to the United States of $1.25 per acre therefor: Provided, That there is found to be no conflicting valid claim to the lands so described: And provided further, That there shall be reserved to the United States all coal, oil, gas, or other mineral deposits found at any time in the land, together with the right of the United States, its grantees or permittees, to prospect for, mine, and remove such deposits, under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 1039) establishing additional land offices in the States of Montana, Oregon, South Dakota, Idaho, New Mexico, Colorado, and Nevada was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

WATERTON-GLACIER INTERNATIONAL PEACE PARK

The bill (H. R. 4752) for establishment of the Waterton-Glacier International Peace Park was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of permanently commemorating the long-existing relationship of peace and good will existing between the people and Governments of Canada and the United States and upon the enactment by the proper authority of the Canadian Government of a similar provision respecting the Waterton Lakes National Park in the Province of Alberta and upon the proclamation of the President of the United States, who is hereby authorized to issue such a proclamation, the Glacier National Park in the State of Montana shall become a part of an international park to be known as the Waterton-Glacier International Peace Park.

SEC. 2. For purposes of administration, promotion, development, and support by appropriations that part of the said Waterton-Glacier International Peace Park within the territory of the United States shall be designated as the Glacier National Park.

MERGER OF DISTRICT STREET-RAILWAY CORPORATIONS

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 13) to authorize the merger of street-railway corporations operating in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask that the joint resolution go over.

Mr. AUSTIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution notwithstanding the objection.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Hull	Robinson, Ark.
Austin	Cutting	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.

Caraway	Hatfield	Norris	Walsh, Mass.
Carey	Hawes	Nye	Waterman
Connally	Hayden	Oddie	Watson
Copeland	Hebert	Patterson	White
Costigan	Howell	Reed

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names; a quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution, which will be reported by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 13) to authorize the merger of street-railway corporations in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for a division.

On a division, the motion was rejected.

SAMSON DAVIS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 332) to correct the military record of Samson Davis, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the words "member of," to strike out "Company A, Ninth Regiment United States Infantry," and insert "the Hospital Corps, United States Army"; and, on line 10, after the date "1902," to insert "Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers Samson Davis, who was a member of the Hospital Corps, United States Army, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of that organization on the 29th day of August, 1902: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Samson Davis."

CHESTER J. DICK

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 669) for the relief of Chester J. Dick, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the word "in," to strike out "the amount of $245.24" and insert "an amount not to exceed $662.77"; and on page 2, line 5, after the words "obligation of," to strike out "$245.24" and insert "$662.77," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General is authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Chester J. Dick, captain, Finance Department, United States Army, in an amount not to exceed $662.77, representing the amount of stoppage against the pay of the said Chester J. Dick ordered by The Adjutant General because of the embezzlement by Otto Melton, former civilian cashier, Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, of funds for which the said Chester J. Dick was accountable.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the said Chester J. Dick an amount equal to the amounts paid by him to the United States in partial settlement of the said obligation of $662.77.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2458) for the relief of Ralph E. Williams for loss suffered on account of the Lawton, Okla., fire, 1917, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1251) relating to the making of loans to veterans upon their adjusted-service certificates was announced as next in order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

INTERNATIONAL GEOLOGICAL CONGRESS

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 82) authorizing an appropriation for the expenses of the sixteenth session of the International Geological Congress to be held in the United States in 1933 was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $85,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the expenses of the sixteenth session of the International Geological Congress to be held in the United States in 1933, including salaries in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, without reference to the classification act of 1923, as amended, communication service, travel expenses, including local transportation and subsistence or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of any other act), stenographic and other services by contract if deemed necessary without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5), printing and binding, rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, official cards, entertainment, hire, operation, and maintenance of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles, and such other expenses as the Secretary of State shall deem proper.

AMENDMENT OF MERCHANT MARINE ACT AS APPLIED TO VIRGIN ISLANDS

The bill (S. 3950) to amend section 21 of the act approved June 5, 1920, entitled "An act to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes," as applied to the Virgin Islands of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] has offered an amendment which can not be accepted to this bill. Inasmuch as he is absent, I will have to ask that the bill be passed over. If he comes in, I will ask to have it taken up again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

SENDING THROUGH THE MAILS OF THREATENING COMMUNICATIONS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 96) to punish the sending through the mails of certain threatening communications, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whoever, with intent to extort or without justification to demand from any person money or other thing of value, shall deposit or cause to be deposited in any post office, or station thereof, or street or other letter box of the United States, or authorized depository for mail matter, to be sent or delivered by the Post Office establishment of the United States, any written or printed letter or other communication with or without a name or designating mark subscribed thereto, addressed to any other person and containing any threat (1) to injure the person, property, or reputation of the addressee or of another or the reputation of a deceased person, or (2) to kidnap any person, or (3) to accuse the addressee or any other person of a crime punishable by law, or (4) to expose any infirmities or failings of any person or to charge any person with infirmities or failings shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 20 years: Provided, That the accused may be indicted and tried either in the district in which the unlawful matter is deposited as aforesaid or in the district to which it is carried by mail for delivery, according to the directions thereon or in the district to which it is directed to be delivered by mail by the person to whom it is addressed.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 5, after the word "law," it is proposed to insert:

Or whoever shall deposit, or cause to be deposited in any post office or station thereof, or street or other letter box of the United States, or authorized depository for mail matter, to be sent or delivered by the Post Office Establishment of the United States, any printed or written letter, or other communication, with or without a name or designating mark subscribed thereto, addressed to any other person and containing any demand or request for ransom or reward for the release of any kidnaped person.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that is not the place to put the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I call to the attention of the Senator the fact that his amendment, I think, is placed in a particular conjunction of words which were stricken out when the bill last was before us. Am I correct in saying that the amendment is after line 5, page 2?

The CHIEF CLERK. On April 18 the Senate, on page 2, lines 5 and 6, struck out the following words: "punishable by law, or (4) to expose any infirmities or failings of any person or to charge any person with infirmities or failings."

Mr. JOHNSON. The amendment is stated to occur where, please?

The CHIEF CLERK. After the word "law" in line 5, which was heretofore stricken out. The last word of the line is "crime."

Mr. JOHNSON. It would be after the word "crime," then.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not rise to address myself to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, but to call to the attention of Senators who have studied this bill the language employed in line 3, page 1:

That whoever, with intent to extort or without justification to demand—

I pointed out the other day that the use of certain language on page 2 of the bill—namely, "punishable by law"—was surplusage and added nothing to the meaning of the bill. I do not know what the legal effect of the language "without justification" would be. Would it mean that if one made a demand of another, and was unable in a court of law to sustain his demand, he would be guilty of a penal offense for making a demand? Plainly under those circumstances a demand would be without justification. Of course, that is not the intention of the bill; but the language ought to be modified so as to state "or without good faith to make a demand," my thought being that the statute should not penalize a demand which might be determined to be without justification if the demand was made in good faith. Frequently it requires court proceedings to determine whether a demand is with or without justification.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. I desire to suggest that depositing a letter in the mail with intent to extort, or without justification, would not of itself be any offense at all unless it was coupled with a threat to injure the property, person, or reputation of another, or to kidnap a person, or to accuse the addressee or any other person of a crime punishable by law. The two things would have to concur in order to constitute any offense. So it does not seem to me that there is any real reason why the words "without justification" should be stricken out when we take them in connection with the language used farther on in the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. May I ask the Senator from Missouri what objection there would be to striking out the words "without justification"? They merely weaken the bill, and make possible a loophole of escape to some one who has sent a letter demanding money with a threat to kidnap. He might claim that he had justification because some person in the other one's family had done him some harm, and that that was justification. Why not strike out the words "without justification"?

Mr. PATTERSON. There is not any real reason why the words should be there. They do not add to or detract from the bill, the way I view it, when it is all read together.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. It seems to me it is just as desirable to punish a threat, which is blackmailing, even if it is made in order to force the payment of a debt which is admittedly due. If the Senator from Missouri were indebted on a promissory note, I am sure he would think it should be made a crime for the payee of that note to threaten to kidnap his child if he did not pay it. It seems to me it introduces an opportunity for legal quibbling to leave the words there, and that the bill would be improved by striking them out.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what could be justification? How could there be justification?

Mr. REED. There could not be justification for a threat; but it is not to the threat that the words apply.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The point I am making is that if it were a legal demand, the sending of a threat would be violative of this statute.

Mr. REED. Exactly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If it were not a legal demand, the demand would be without justification and it would be illegal. Why complicate the matter by raising an issue of that character? As stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania, if one undertakes to collect a just debt by the employment of the processes contemplated in this bill, by threats of violence or harm, it ought to be prohibited, even though the demand is with justification; that is to say, even though there may be a valid debt.

I have no pride of opinion about the matter, but I think the words "or without justification to demand" should go out; and I think the word "extort" would carry all the meaning, expressed and implied, that is in the mind of the author of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of the amendment? It is a little long, and we have not it before us.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, the amendment, stripped of its legal verbiage, simply makes it an offense to deposit in the mails a demand for ransom for a kidnapped person. That is the sum and the substance of the amendment. It forbids a demand for ransom for the return of a kidnapped person.

Mr. BINGHAM. May we have it read again?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be restated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Missouri offers the following amendment:

On page 2, line 5, after the word "crime," insert:

Or whoever shall deposit, or cause to be deposited in any post office or station thereof, or street or other letter box of the United States, or authorized depository for mail matter, to be sent or delivered by the post-office establishment of the United States, any printed or written letter, or other communication, with or without a name or designating mark subscribed thereto, addressed to any other person and containing any demand or request for ransom or reward for the release of any kidnapped person.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not see any objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri. Upon hearing it read, it impresses me as in harmony with the general purposes and provisions of the bill. It specifies an act which is obnoxious to the minds of all law-abiding persons; and I believe the amendment of the Senator from Missouri should be agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is there any way in which provision could be made for the protection of an innocent person who is handed a letter of this kind by a guilty person, and requested to deposit it in a mail box?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I think it should read "knowingly" to do it. I think the suggestion is a very good one, if the language employed by the Senator from Missouri does not comprehend the guilty knowledge of the person actually transmitting the message.

Mr. BINGHAM. Should not that word also be inserted on page 1, line 10? It applies also to a letter threatening to kidnap, and would apply to an innocent person depositing such a letter in a mail box without knowing what he was doing, subjecting him to a fine of $5,000 and 20 years in jail. Should not the word "knowingly" be placed in there at the proper point?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, under the conditions that surround us while we are considering this bill, it is very difficult to answer the question of the Senator from Connecticut conclusively. I am rather impressed that his suggestion is a good one. It does seem to me that this bill ought to be considered by the Judiciary Committee. It would require only a very brief period, and it would be helpful to have the committee pass on the bill. I wonder whether the author of the bill would object to that?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I reported the bill from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and I would have no objection to it taking the course suggested. I want to say that the proposal submitted in the amendment of the Senator from Missouri was not before our committee at all, and it was not considered by the committee. I have read the proposed amendment of the Senator from Missouri as he has submitted it to me, and I think it is a very wise suggestion, and that the amendment should be incorporated in the bill under any circumstances.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I suggest that the bill, with all amendments, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that he propose the amendment of which he spoke a moment ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Arkansas to ask unanimous consent that the bill and all amendments proposed in the Senate be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, would that include the amendment of the Senator from Missouri?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has it been offered?

Mr. PATTERSON. The amendment has been offered.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I dislike to see anything done with the bill which would delay it, because I understand it is needed. At the same time, it would create a very serious crime, punishable by 20 years in jail, and it seems to me that so many points have been raised regarding the absence of necessary words or the inclusion of unnecessary words that it would be wise to have the bill referred to the Judiciary Committee, with the request that it be reported back immediately in such form as may meet the views of that committee.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the bill is to be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, I want to suggest one further amendment.

I believe it has been understood that the words "or without justification to demand" shall come out. That would leave the bill reading in this way, "with intent to extort from any person money or other thing of value." A law in those words could never in the world be used to convict anybody, because legally "to extort" means to compel the payment of money under color of office. The words "extort" and "extortion" have a definite meaning in law, except in a few places where I suppose they have been broadened by statute. Ordinarily "to extort" means to compel the payment of money under assertion of some right of public office, and if that word were left in the measure, the first criminal lawyer who saw it would get his client acquitted, because what we mean is "to compel the payment of money," not "to extort" it.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is right about that.

Mr. REED. That is one of the things the Judiciary Committee ought to consider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous consent request preferred by the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and that order will be entered.

Mr. McKELLAR subsequently said: Mr. President, in the case of Order of Business No. 520, House bill 96, which was considered this morning, the bill being rereferred to the Committee on the Judiciary after having been reported from the Post Office Committee, I offer an amendment to the bill.

I ask unanimous consent at this point that the amendment I offer, together with the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON] be printed in a new print for the benefit of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

IMMIGRATION VISAS

The bill (S. 34) to provide for a review of the action of consular officers in refusing immigration visas was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGES, NEW JERSEY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1335) to provide for the appointment of two additional district judges for the district of New Jersey, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments, on page 1, line 4, to strike out the word "two" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "one"; on line 5 to strike out the word "judges" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "judge"; and on page 2, line 2, to strike out the word "judges" and to insert the word "judge," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one additional district judge for the District Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey, who shall reside in such district, and whose compensation, duties, and powers shall be the same as now provided by law for other district judges. A vacancy occurring at any time in the office of the district judge herein provided for is authorized to be filled.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am compelled to ask that this bill go over. I may want to present an amendment to it.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will not the Senator withhold his objection temporarily until I may make a brief statement with regard to the urgent need of this legislation?

Mr. JOHNSON. I know about that. I am perfectly willing to withhold the objection, but there is similar urgent need in at least one jurisdiction of the West.

Mr. HEBERT. I may say to the Senator that we have a number of bills under consideration in the Committee on the Judiciary providing for various districts, among others the one to which the Senator refers.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am sure of that.

Mr. HEBERT. This is but one of many we have under consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to add one from the West.

Mr. HEBERT. Do I understand the Senator wants to add one in this bill?

Mr. JOHNSON. I think it would be a very appropriate thing. Does not the Senator think so?

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I do not know that I have any serious objection to that being done, except that I think the committee ought to consider each one of those cases on its own merits.

Mr. JOHNSON. Inasmuch as the Senator is considering a necessity that is even greater than that of New Jersey at the present time, I will make no further objection to the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge for the district of New Jersey."

REGULATION OF PLUMBING AND GAS FITTING

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3400) to amend an act of Congress approved June 18, 1898, entitled "An act to regulate plumbing and gas fitting in the District of Columbia, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, on page 1, line 8, to strike out the words "bona fide residents of the District of Columbia," and to insert the words "citizens of the United States," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 3 and 4 of the act of Congress approved June 18, 1898, entitled "An act to regulate plumbing and gas fitting in the District of Columbia," be, and the same are hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That applicants for licenses as master plumbers and gas fitters or master gas fitters, who are citizens of the United States, must be 21 years of age, must make application in their own handwriting, and must accompany such application with a certificate as to good character signed by at least three reputable residents of the District of Columbia, two of whom shall certify that the applicants have had at least four years' experience in the plumbing and gas-fitting business. Nonresident applicants for licenses as master plumbers and gas fitters or master gas fitters may present to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia a certificate from the examining board of plumbers or gas fitters in the State or Territory, or city in which the principal place of business of each applicant is located, showing qualifications equal to those prescribed by this section for resident applicants, and, upon presenting such certificate, shall be exempted from examination but shall be required to pay the fee for license provided in section 4 for resident applicants. Such exemption from examination shall, however, be granted only when the State, Territory, or city of the principal place of business of the applicant extends reciprocal privileges to applicants from the District of Columbia holding licenses therein as master plumbers and/or master gas fitters.

"SEC. 4. That all renewals of existing licenses and all new licenses as a master plumber and gas fitter or master gas fitter shall be for a period of not more than one year and that the fee for such license shall be not less than $25 nor more than $50 per annum, to be fixed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, for a license year beginning January 1 and ending December 31. Such special license fee shall be separate from, or in addition to any contractors' or business license tax, hereafter fixed for this and similar occupations by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia according to law. Licenses issued at any time after the beginning of the year shall date from the first day of the month in which the license is issued and end on the last day of the license year, and payment shall be made of a proportional amount of the annual license fee. Any licensee may apply for and receive a license for or on behalf of any firm, copartnership, or corporation that he is a bona fide member of, or a substantial stockholder in, but all plumbing or gas fitting done pursuant to such license shall be done under the immediate personal supervision of the licensed man.

"The Commissioners of the District of Columbia or their duly authorized agent shall have the power to suspend or revoke any plumber's or gas fitter's license for a violation of the plumbing or gas-fitting regulations after a public hearing granted the licensee or after conviction in court for such violation or for conduct involving moral turpitude. This act shall become effective on the 1st day of January following its enactment."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I ask that this bill may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

CONTRACTS FOR PUBLIC WORKS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The bill (S. 3472) to amend the act of Congress approved June 26, 1912, entitled "An act making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress approved June 26, 1912 (37 Stat. 168), be, and the same is hereby, amended to provide that formal written contracts with bond for construction and repair work of any character shall not be required where the labor cost of such work does not exceed the sum of $5,000, and hereafter it shall not be necessary to give notice in out-of-town newspapers of the intention to perform construction or repair work of any character, unless the estimated labor cost shall exceed the sum of $10,000; nor shall it be necessary to give notice in any newspaper of the intention to perform any such work unless the estimated labor cost exceeds the sum of $5,000.

NATIONAL ECONOMIC COUNCIL—PRINTING OF HEARINGS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 18) authorizing the printing of 3,000 additional copies of hearings held before the Committee on Manufactures on the Establishment of a National Economic Council, which was, on page 1, line 5, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three" and insert "one."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

APPOINTMENTS OF MIDSHIPMEN

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8083) providing for the appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy of all midshipmen who graduate from the Naval Academy in 1932, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the President pro tempore appointed the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], and the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] conferees on the part of the Senate.

FIRST STATE BANK & TRUST CO. OF MISSION, TEX.

The bill (H. R. 3953) for the relief of the First State Bank & Trust Co. of Mission, Tex., was announced as next in order.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be recommitted for further consideration of the bill by the committee. This request is made at the suggestion of the Treasury Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous consent request preferred by the Senator from Nebraska?

The Chair hears none, and the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

SENELMA WIRKKULA AND OTHERS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 1770) for the relief of Senelma Wirkkula, also known as Selma Wirkkula; Alice Marie Wirkkula; and Bernice Elaine Wirkkula, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 2, line 5, after the word "Minnesota," to insert the words "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000," so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $5,000 to Senelma Wirkkula, also known as Selma Wirkkula, wife of Gust Henry Wirkkula, also known as Henry Wirkkula, on account of the death of the said Gust Henry Wirkkula, also known as Henry Wirkkula, who was killed by one Emmett J. White (a Federal officer, known as a Federal border patrolman, in Government service, while on duty), on June 8, 1929, while driving an automobile on a public highway near International Falls, in Koochiching County, Minn.: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

GRINA BROS.

The bill (H. R. 1231) for the relief of Grina Bros. was considered, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem in favor of Grina Bros., of Ambrose, N. Dak., United States coupon note No. D-4419811 in the demonination of $100 of the Victory 4¾ per cent notes of 1922-23, called for redemption December 15, 1922, without interest and without presentation of the said note, which is alleged to have been lost or stolen: Provided, That the said note shall not have been previously presented for payment and that no payment shall be made hereunder for any coupons which may have been attached to the note: Provided further, That the said Grina Bros. shall first file in the Treasury Department a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of said note in such form and with such corporate surety as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the note hereinbefore described.

ALVINA HOLLIS

The bill (H. R. 1768) for the relief of Alvina Hollis was considered, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Alvina Hollis, the sum of $1,500 in full settlement of all claims against the United States because of personal injuries sustained by the said Alvina Hollis when struck and injured on or about October 4, 1928, by a motor truck owned and operated by the Post Office Department of the United States: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

RELIEF OF INDIANS IN WASHINGTON, IDAHO, AND MONTANA

The bill (S. 1523) for the relief of certain tribes or bands of Indians in the States of Washington, Idaho, and Montana was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

CLAIMS OF CHIPPEWA INDIANS OF MINNESOTA

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

JOHN J. CORCORAN

The bill (S. 903) for the relief of John J. Corcoran was announced as next in order.

Mr. HOWELL. Let that go over.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, if the Senator who made the objection will withhold his objection for a moment, I would like to say that this is a very small claim, amounting to some $600, which has been pending for 10 years. The bill was reported unanimously by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I will be glad to confer with the Senator from Massachusetts regarding the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska maintains his objection. The bill will go over.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts subsequently said: Mr. President, the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] recently objected to the consideration of Senate bill 903, for the relief of John J. Corcoran. I have conferred with the Senator, and it is my judgment, after conferring with him, that the bill should be recommitted to the Committee on Claims, of which he is chairman. Therefore I move that the bill be recommitted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

COLORADO RIVER TRIBAL FUNDS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3864) authorizing expenditures from Colorado River tribal funds for reimbursable loans, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments, on page 2, line 2, after the word "support," to insert the words "and Indians having irrigable allotments to assist them in the development and cultivation thereof," and on line 10 to insert the words "loans on irrigable lands for permanent improvement of said lands in which the period for repayment may run for not exceeding 20 years, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, and," so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to use not to exceed $25,000 from tribal funds on deposit to the Indians of the Colorado River Indian Reservation, Ariz., for the construction of homes for individual members of the tribe, the purchase for sale to them of seed, animals, machinery, tools, implements, building material, and other equipment and supplies, and for advances to old, disabled, or indigent Indians for their support, and Indians having irrigable allotments to assist them in the development and cultivation thereof: Provided, That expenditures for the purposes above set forth shall be limited to the fiscal years 1932 and 1933 and such expenditures shall be made under conditions to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior for repayment to the United States for deposit to the credit of the Colorado River Indian tribal fund on or before June 30, 1938, except in the case of loans on irrigable lands for permanent improvement of said lands in which the period for repayment may run for not exceeding 20 years, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, and advances to old, disabled, or indigent Indians for their support, such advances to remain a charge and lien against their lands until paid.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of the United States is given to be named a party in any suit which is now pending, or which may hereafter be brought in the courts of the State of Michigan having jurisdiction of the subject matter, for the purpose of clearing the title to, and removing liens from, all those pieces or parcels of land situate and being in the county of Lenawee and State of Michigan, described as follows, to wit:

The west half northwest quarter section 35, township 5 south, range 4 east, containing 80 acres of land, be the same more or less. Also that tract beginning at the northwest corner of Maumee and Boughton Streets in the village of Tecumseh, thence along the west line of said Maumee Street north to the corner of Lave Baxter, jr.'s, land, thence west along said Baxter's land to the mill pond, thence southwardly along the east side of said mill pond to said Boughton Street, thence along the north line of said Boughton Street to the place of beginning, containing about 30 acres of land, be the same more or less. Also village lot 130; and also that tract of land beginning at the southwest corner of said village lot 130 and on the east line of Mill Street; thence along the east line of said last-mentioned street southwardly to the line between village lots 126 and 127, thence along the said line last mentioned eastwardly to the east line of said lots; thence eastwardly to the line between village lots 139 and 140; thence along said lots to Maumee Street; thence north along the west line of said street to the line between village lots 133 and 134; thence along the south line of said lot 133 and of lots 132, 131, and 130 to the place of beginning, containing about 10 acres of land, be the same more or less.

SEC. 2. Service upon the United States shall be made by serving the process of the court, with a copy of the bill of complaint, upon the United States attorney for the eastern district of Michigan, and by sending copies of the process and bill, by registered mail, to the Attorney General of the United States, at Washington, D. C. The United States shall have 30 days after service as above provided, or such further time as the court may allow, within which to appear and answer, disclaim, plead, or demur.

SEC. 3. The final judgment or decree of the court in any suit brought under this act shall have the same effect respecting the discharge of a purported mortgage given by Joseph W. Brown and Cornelia T. Brown, his wife, of the first part, to the United States of America, of the second part, dated November 21, 1835, and recorded on December 30, 1835, in the register of deeds' office of Lenawee County, Mich., in Liber B of Mortgages, at page 447, as may be provided with respect to such matters by the law of the State of Michigan.

SEC. 4. No judgment for costs or other money judgment shall be rendered against the United States in any suit or proceeding which may be brought under the provisions of this act. Nor shall the United States be or become liable for the payment of the costs of any such suit or proceeding or any part thereof.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 8754) to control the possession, sale, transfer, and use of pistols and other dangerous weapons in the District of Columbia, to provide penalties, to prescribe rules of evidence, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

AMENDMENT OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA TRAFFIC ACTS

The bill (S. 4123) to amend the District of Columbia traffic acts, as amended, was considered.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this bill was introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and provides that the Sergeant at Arms and other elective officers of the Senate shall be supplied with congressional automobile tags. I move to amend the bill on page 1, line 10, after the word "Representatives," by inserting the words "the attending physician of the House of Representatives."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the amendment be stated for the information of the Senate.

The amendment was, on page 1, line 10, after the word "Representatives," to insert "the attending physician," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the proviso of paragraph (c), section 6, of the District of Columbia traffic acts, as amended by the act approved February 27, 1931, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows: Provided, That hereafter congressional tags shall be issued by the commissioners under consecutive numbers, one to each Senator and Representative in Congress, to the elective officers and disbursing clerks of the Senate and House of Representatives, the attending physician, and the assistant secretaries (one for the majority and one for the minority of the Senate), for their official use, which, when used by them individually while on official business, shall authorize them to park their automobiles in any available curb space in the District of Columbia, except within fire plug, fire house, loading station, and loading platform limitations, and such congressional tags shall not be assigned to or used by others."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

QUINTANA PLACE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The bill (S. 3911) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to close Quintana Place, between Seventh Street and Seventh Place NW., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to close Quintana Place, between Seventh Street and Seventh Place NW., running through square 3160 in the District of Columbia, dedicated as a public highway by plat recorded December 23, 1925, and recorded in book No. 80, page 173, of the records of the surveyor of the District of Columbia: Provided, That the title to the land lying within the area hereby closed shall revert to the proprietor of the adjoining blocks, the land in the said dedication never having been improved or used as a highway.

CLOSING STREETS AND ALLEYS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The bill (S. 4106) to provide for the closing of certain streets and alleys in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to close R Street for its full width from the east boundary of parcel 224/27 to the west building line of Sixteenth Street; to close Fifteenth Street for its full width from the north line of R Street to the southeasterly building line of Fairlawn Avenue; to close part of Q Street abutting lot 23 in square 5598; to close all public alleys in square 5598, and to close the public alley 16 feet wide in square 5604 extending south from R Street to the south line of lots 101 and 802 in said square 5604, all in the southeast section of the District of Columbia, the ground within the lines of the parts of streets and alleys so closed to revert to the District of Columbia for use for school purposes: Provided, That the owners of all property abutting on the parts of streets and alleys so closed shall consent to such closing.

SEC. 2. That Q Street, located within the boundaries of parcel 224/7 and extending from the west line of Sixteenth Street to the southeasterly line of Fairlawn Avenue, and R Street, located within the boundaries of parcel 224/27, extending from the east building line of Fourteenth Street to the east boundary of said parcel 224/27, are hereby removed from the plan of the permanent system of highways for the District of Columbia.

RESTORATION OF HOMESTEAD RIGHTS

The bill (S. 4029) to restore homestead rights in certain cases was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter any person who has heretofore made entry under the homestead laws on any lands embraced within any reservation ceded to the United States by the Indian tribes, and has paid for his land the sum of at least $1.25 per acre, shall, upon proof of such facts, if otherwise qualified, be entitled to the benefit of the homestead law as though such former entry had not been made; but the provisions of this act shall not apply to any person who has failed to pay the full price for his former entry or whose former entry was canceled for fraud.

REMOVAL OF DISCRIMINATION IN LAND GRANTS

The bill (S. 4165) to remove existing discriminations incident to certain land grants and to subject them to the same conditions that govern other land grants of their class was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the land-grant railroad heretofore operated and now being operated between the stations of Hastings and Ortonville, in the State of Minnesota, the land-grant railroad heretofore operated and now being operated between the stations of Houston and Airlie, in the State of Minnesota, the land-grant railroad heretofore operated and now being operated between the stations of Humboldt and Junction City, in the State of Kansas, and the land-grant railroad heretofore operated and now being operated between the stations of Jonesville and Mackinaw City, in the State of Michigan, shall hereafter receive compensation for transportation of property and troops of the United States at the same rate as is paid to land-grant railroads organized under the land grant act of March 3, 1863, and the act of July 2, 1866 (ch. 278): Provided, That the Congress hereby reserves the right at any time by law to prescribe such charges as it deems advisable for such Government transportation.

TRANSFER OF SCHOOL LANDS IN NORTH DAKOTA

The bill (S. 4416) to provide for the transfer of certain school lands in North Dakota to the International Peace Garden (Inc.), was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding any provision of any law of the United States to the contrary, the State of North Dakota is hereby authorized to provide by law for the transfer without cost of all of section 36, township 164 north, range 73 west, fifth principal meridian, containing 640 acres, more or less, according to the United States Government survey thereof, to the International Peace Garden (Inc.), a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of New York, to be used and maintained by the said International Peace Garden (Inc.), and in connection with other lands in the State of North Dakota and in the Province of Manitoba, Dominion of Canada, as a memorial to commemorate the long existing relationship of peace and good will between the people and Governments of Canada and the United States.

The conveyance from the State of North Dakota to said International Peace Garden (Inc.) shall contain a provision that if said land shall at any time thereafter cease to be used and maintained as an international peace garden the land shall revert to the State of North Dakota, and upon reversion to the State of North Dakota said land shall become subject to the laws of the United States applying thereto to the same extent as if this act had not been enacted.

CONVEYANCE OF LANDS TO MINNESOTA

The bill (H. R. 5603) to authorize the conveyance by the United States to the State of Minnesota of lot 4, section 18, township 131 north, range 29 west, in the county of Morrison, Minn., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to convey to the State of Minnesota all right, title, and interest of the United States in and to lot 4, section 18, township 131 north, range 29 west, fifth principal meridian, in the county of Morrison, State of Minnesota, formerly a part of Fort Ripley Military Reservation and restored to homestead entry by act of April 1, 1880 (21 Stat. L. 69), for military purposes and specifically as part of Camp Ripley Military Reservation. Such conveyance shall contain the express condition that if said State of Minnesota shall at any time cease to use such lot for such purpose or shall alienate or attempt to alienate such lot title thereto shall revert to the United States.

GRANT OF LANDS TO SAN DIEGO

The bill (H. R. 10495) amending an act of Congress approved February 28, 1919 (40 Stat. L. 1206), granting the city of San Diego certain lands in the Cleveland National Forest and the Capitan Grande Indian Reservation for dam and reservoir purposes for the conservation of water, and for other purposes, so as to include additional lands, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of an act of Congress approved February 28, 1919, granting the city of San Diego certain lands in the Cleveland National Forest and the Capitan Grande Indian Reservation for dam and reservoir purposes for the conservation of water and other purposes, be amended to read as follows:

"That the south half northeast quarter northwest quarter and the north half southwest quarter section 8; the west half southwest quarter southwest quarter and the west half northeast quarter northwest quarter section 9, all in township 15 south, range 2 east, San Bernardino base and meridian, within the Cleveland National Forest; and the southwest quarter southwest quarter, the east half southwest quarter, the northwest quarter southeast quarter, and the west half northeast quarter southeast quarter section 11; the north half northwest quarter and the southwest quarter northwest quarter section 14; the southeast quarter southwest quarter, the southwest quarter southeast quarter, the east half southwest quarter southwest quarter, the northeast quarter southwest quarter, the east half northeast quarter northwest quarter, the east half southeast quarter northwest quarter, the northeast quarter, the north half southeast quarter, and the southeast quarter southeast quarter section 15; the northeast quarter southeast quarter section 21; the northwest quarter northeast quarter, the northwest quarter, the north half southwest quarter, the southwest quarter southwest quarter, the west half northeast quarter northeast quarter, and the south half northeast quarter section 22; the west half northwest quarter section 27; the east half northeast quarter, the southwest quarter northeast quarter, the southeast quarter, the east half northeast quarter southwest quarter, the east half southeast quarter southwest quarter, and the east half northwest quarter northeast quarter section 28; and the northeast quarter, the west half southeast quarter, the east half southwest quarter, the southeast quarter northwest quarter, and the east half northeast quarter northwest quarter section 33, all in township 14 south, range 2 east, San Bernardino base and meridian; also the north half southwest quarter, the southwest quarter southwest quarter, the west half northwest quarter southeast quarter, the west half southwest quarter southeast quarter, and the north half southeast quarter southwest quarter section 3; and lots 2, 3, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and the south half section 4, all in township 15 south, range 2 east, San Bernardino base and meridian, within the Capitan Grande Indian Reservation, all within the county of San Diego and State of California, are hereby granted to the city of San Diego, a municipal corporation in said county and State, for dam and reservoir purposes for the conservation and storage of water, whenever said city shall have provided compensation as hereinafter specified for all property rights and interests and damages done to Mission Indians located upon the Capitan Grande Indian Reservation: Provided, That the lands herein granted shall not be sold, assigned, transferred, or conveyed to any private person, corporation, or association; and in case of any attempt to sell, assign, transfer, or convey, or upon a failure to use and apply said lands exclusively to the purposes herein specified, this grant shall revert to the United States: Provided, however, That proceedings to acquire the 920 acres of additional land granted by this act, as herein amended, by eminent domain of the State of California as authorized by the provisions of this act herein contained, may at the option of the city of San Diego be dispensed with; and if the said city so elects and upon payment by said city as compensation for such lands, rights, interests, and damages of the additional sum of $35,567.20, the Secretary of the Interior of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to issue to said city a patent in fee simple conveying all the rights, titles, and interests of the said Indians and of the United States in and to all of the lands herein above described: Provided further, That no provisions of this act and nothing done in carrying out its provisions, as between the United States, said Mission Indians and their grantees, shall in any wise limit or terminate any rights within the Capitan Grande Indian Reservation of any person, persons, or corporations heretofore granted or conveyed under or by authority of the laws of the United States.

"No provisions of this act and nothing done in carrying out its provisions shall have the effect of terminating or limiting the rights of said Capitan Grande Indians or of the United States in or to the lands or in the waters flowing in or along the lands remaining in and forming a part of the Capitan Grande Reservation after the city of San Diego has acquired title to the lands herein granted: Provided, That in the event the Indians of the Capitan Grande Reservation, or any of them, are located on additional land or lands purchased by the United States for them and situate within the watershed of the San Diego River, the said Indians or any of them or the United States in their behalf shall have the right to transfer to such additional land or lands, in whole or in part, such water rights as they or the United States possess on the Capitan Grande Indian Reservation, and subject to the conditions hereinafter provided shall have the same right to develop and use a like quantity of water on such additional land or lands as they have heretofore had the right to develop and use within said reservation: Provided further, That the total quantity of water developed and used by the said Indians or by the United States in their behalf, including the use continued on the diminished reservation, shall not exceed in the aggregate the total quantity of water which said Indians or the United States in their behalf have heretofore had the right to develop and use within the Capitan Grande Indian Reservation.

"The grant herein to the said city of San Diego is hereby expressly made subject to such rights, which rights shall not be subject to loss by nonuse or abandonment thereof so long as the title to said lands remains in the Indians or in the United States.

"The funds paid and those to be paid by the said city of San Diego as compensation to the Capitan Grande Indians for their lands shall, in addition to the uses in the act of February 28, 1919 (40 Stat. L. 1206–1209), for the removal of said Indians as a tribe, be available also for reestablishing individually or as a group or groups the Capitan Grande Band of Indians, including those residing within the Conejos Valley of the retained reservation, on tract or tracts of land to be acquired by purchase or otherwise for them, and for the acquiring of water rights including cost of transferring in whole or in part their present water rights to such other lands, construction of necessary water works, including the development of a water supply, for domestic and irrigation purposes, purchasing or building homes, purchasing of household furnishings, farm equipment, livestock, and other improvements for the benefit of these Indians under such rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That those Indians desiring to remain on that part of the Capitan Grande Reservation not disposed of under this act may remain thereon and receive such benefits there."

SEC. 2. Nothing contained in section 1 hereof shall be held, deemed, or construed as affecting, altering, or in any wise changing the rights of the riparian owners under the provisions in the act approved February 28, 1919.

CHANGE OF NAME OF COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS

The resolution (S. Res. 26) changing the name of the Committee on Pensions to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs and defining its jurisdiction was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Over.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator if he will withhold his objection for a moment. I want to offer an amendment to the resolution.

Mr. REED. I withhold the objection.

Mr. BROOKHART. I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 1, line 9, strike out the word "in" and insert in lieu thereof the words "discharged from," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That so much of paragraph 1 of Rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate as reads "Committee on Pensions, to consist of 11 Senators" is amended to read as follows:

"Committee on Veterans' Affairs, to consist of 13 Senators, to which shall be referred all legislation and other matters relating to pensions, Government life insurance, and death or disability compensation, hospitalization, and allowances of persons discharged from the military or naval service of the United States and their beneficiaries, and all legislation and other matters relating to the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and its branches."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] was called from the Chamber on account of some public matters and asked me to object to the consideration of the resolution. I think that should apply to the consideration of the amendment at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On objection, the resolution will go over with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa pending.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I desire to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. McNARY. In that event I shall have to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Hull	Reed

Costigan	Howell	Pittman	White

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the motion proposed by the Senator from Iowa. That motion is not debatable.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, may the resolution on which we are about to vote be reported so that the Senate may understand what it is voting on?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported for the information of the Senate.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 26) as proposed to be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion proposed by the Senator from Iowa to proceed to the consideration of the resolution.

The motion was rejected.

MINING OF POTASH ON PUBLIC DOMAIN

The bill (S. 3953) to amend the act approved February 7, 1927, entitled "An act to promote the mining of potash on the public domain," was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved February 7, 1927, entitled "An act to promote the mining of potash on the public domain," is hereby amended by adding thereto a section, to be numbered 7, reading as follows:

"SEC. 7. Any prospecting permit issued under this act may be extended by the Secretary of the Interior for a period not exceeding two years, upon a showing of satisfactory cause."

CLOSING OF ALLEYS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The bill (S. 3929) to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to close certain alleys and to set aside land owned by the District of Columbia for alley purposes, was considered. The bill had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, with amendments on page 3, after line 3, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 3. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall cause public notice to be given, by advertisement in a newspaper of general circulation in the District of Columbia, of any order to be made by the said commissioners under the authority granted them by the provisions of this act: Provided, That such public notice shall be given not less than 30 days prior to the effective date of such order: And provided further, That if any interested property owner affected adversely by such order shall request a public hearing by the said commissioners, within 30 days prior to the effective date of the order, the said commissioners shall grant such hearing.

And on page 3, line 16, to renumber the section, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to close the alley in square 2740, abutting lots 9 to 14, both inclusive, and extending east from the 16-foot alley in said square; to close the alleys in square 3268 extending south from Sheridan Street to the 20-foot alley running east and west through said square, and to close all that portion of the alley 10 feet wide in square 4541 abutting lots 803 and 804, and extending northerly from Rosedale Street to the 10-foot alley running east and west in said square, the District of Columbia being the owner of all the property abutting on said alleys herein authorized to be closed in said squares 2740, 3268, and 4541; and the said commissioners are further authorized to close any alleys or parts of alleys in the District of Columbia when, in their judgment, such alleys, or parts of alleys, are rendered useless and unnecessary by reason of the acquisition of abutting land for municipal purposes: Provided, That the District of Columbia, prior to the closing of any such alley or part of alley, has acquired title to all the land abutting on the alley or part of alley proposed to be closed: Provided further, That the title to the land comprised in the alleys or parts of alleys so closed shall revert to the District of Columbia: And provided further, That no property owner within the block where such alleys or parts of alleys are closed shall be deprived of the right of access to his property by alleys or parts of alleys, unless adequate access to such property be substituted therefor.

SEC. 2. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby further authorized to set aside for alley purposes any land owned by the District of Columbia whenever it becomes necessary to provide additional area for alleys by reason of the closing of any alley or part of any alley: Provided, That in each case the area set aside for alley purposes shall not exceed the area of the alley or part of alley closed.

SEC. 3. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall cause public notice to be given, by advertisement in a newspaper of general circulation in the District of Columbia, of any order to be made by the said commissioners under the authority granted them by the provisions of this act: Provided, That such public notice shall be given not less than 30 days prior to the effective date of such order: And provided further, That if any interested property owner affected adversely by such order shall request a public hearing by the said commissioners, within 30 days prior to the effective date of the order, the said commissioners shall grant such hearing.

SEC. 4. That any and all necessary maps showing the action taken by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia under the provisions of this act shall be prepared by the surveyor of the District of Columbia, approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and ordered by said commissioners to be recorded in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM S. COOK

The bill (S. 1562) for the relief of William S. Cook was considered. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 1, line 8, after "November," to strike out the numeral "2" and insert "9," so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws or any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, their widows, and dependent relatives, William S. Cook shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged as a private, Company G, Fifth Regiment United States Infantry, on November 9, 1900: Provided, That no pension, pay, bounty, or other allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2687) to provide for the establishment of a national employment system and for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such system, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED and Mr. BINGHAM. Over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES

The bill (S. 2654) to allow credit in connection with homestead entries to widows of persons who served in certain Indian wars was considered. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, after the word "entitled," to strike out "under the provisions of such act to receive credit for military service in connection with a homestead entry or settlement," and to insert in lieu thereof "to make homestead entry or settlement and receive credit in connection therewith for military service under the provisions of such act," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions and limitations of the act entitled "An act to allow credit to homestead settlers and entrymen for military service in certain Indian wars," approved April 7, 1930, are hereby extended to the widow of any person who would be entitled to make homestead entry or settlement and receive credit in connection therewith for military service under the provisions of such act, if such widow is unmarried and otherwise qualified to make entry of public lands under the provisions of the homestead laws of the United States and has heretofore made or shall hereafter make such entry: Provided, That in the event of the death of any such widow prior to perfection of title, leaving only a minor child or children, patent shall issue to the said minor child or children upon proof of death, and of the minority of the child or children, without further showing or compliance with law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TAKING OF LANDS FOR HIGHWAY PURPOSES

The bill (S. 3852) to amend section 2288 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, with respect to the taking for highway purposes of lands entered upon under the homestead laws was considered. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with an amendment, on page 1, line 5, after the word "following," to strike out "new sentence: 'Any portion of the claim of any such settler may be condemned for highway purposes under the laws of the State or Territory where such land is located, in the same manner as land owned in fee in such State or Territory may be condemned for such purposes, and the amount of compensation awarded pursuant to the condemnation proceedings shall be paid to the Commissioner of the General Land Office to be held by him for payment to the settler to whom patent is issued upon final action being taken on such claim, or to the United States in the event that final proof is not made on the claim and no patent is issued; and the United States shall be a necessary party to any such condemnation proceedings.'"

And to insert in lieu thereof "Any portion of the claim or entry of such settler may be condemned for highway purposes under the laws of the State or Territory where such land is located: Provided, That such condemnation proceedings shall not affect the rights or property of the United States in any manner whatsoever, but shall be effective against the settler to the extent of his interest in the land condemned: Provided further, That the amount of compensation awarded pursuant to such condemnation proceedings shall be paid to the Commissioner of the General Land Office to be held by him for payment to the settler or entryman to whom patent is issued on such claim or entry, after final action has been taken under the public land laws: And provided further, That if final proof is not made by the claimant, or in case the entry is canceled, the said commissioner shall cause the money received by him for such compensation to be covered into the Treasury of the United States."

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2288 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is amended (a) by inserting after the word "railroads" a comma and the word "highways"; and (b) by adding at the end thereof the following: "Any portion of the claim or entry of such settler may be condemned for highway purposes under the laws of the State or Territory where such land is located: Provided—

And so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 2288 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, with respect to the taking for highway purposes of lands entered upon under the homestead or preemption laws."

NATIONAL SOCIETY, COLONIAL DAMES OF AMERICA

The bill (S. 570) to exempt from taxation certain property of the National Society of Colonial Dames of America in the District of Columbia, was considered. The bill had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That certain property in the District of Columbia described as lot 801, in square 1285, together with the improvements thereon, known as premises No. 2715 Q Street NW., and the furnishings therein, owned by the National Society of the Colonial Dames of America Corporation, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the District of Columbia, be exempt from taxation, national and municipal, so long as the same is used for nonprofit purposes by the National Society of the Colonial Dames of America, an unincorporated society.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to exempt from taxation certain property used by the National Society of the Colonial Dames of America, in the District of Columbia."

ISSUANCE OF BONDS BY ST. THOMAS HARBOR BOARD, VIRGIN ISLANDS

The bill (S. 4193) to authorize the issuance of bonds by the St. Thomas Harbor Board, Virgin Islands, for the acquisition or construction of a graving or dry dock, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of acquiring and installing or building a dry dock or graving dock in the harbor of St. Thomas, Krum Bay, Virgin Islands, or in Gregerie Channel adjacent to such harbor, the St. Thomas Harbor Board, a municipal institution, is authorized, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to issue registered or coupon bonds in any sum not to exceed $150,000. Such bonds shall be sold at not less than their par value with accrued interest, shall bear interest at a rate not to exceed 6 per cent per annum, and shall be payable in gold coin of the United States at such place or places as shall be designated by such board in the bonds. Such bonds shall be issued in serial form maturing in substantially equal annual installments, the first installment to mature not later than 5 years from the date of the issue of such series, and the last installment not later than 30 years from the date of such issue, except that said board may reserve the right to pay off such bonds in their numerical order at the rate of $20,000 or less per annum from and after the expiration of four years from their date of issue.

ROLANDO B. MOFFETT

The bill (S. 3577) for the relief of Rolando B. Moffett was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Rolando B. Moffett, who was a member of Company H, Eleventh Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 30th day of September, 1880: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged members of the military and naval forces of the United States and their dependents Basil N. Henry, late of Company A, Three hundred and forty-eighth Machine Gun Battalion, American Expeditionary Forces, World War, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged on the 17th day of February, 1919: Provided, That no compensation, retirement pay, back pay, pension, or other benefit shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

ADDITIONAL FACILITIES FOR INTERMEDIATE CREDIT BANKS

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, earlier in the day on objection the Senate passed over Order of Business 602, being the bill (S. 2409) to amend Title II of the Federal farm loan act in regard to Federal intermediate credit banks, and for other purposes. I ask unanimous consent at this time that the Senate may recur to that bill and that it may be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, before proceeding with the consideration of the bill may we have an explanation of the changes it proposes to make in the existing law?

Mr. STEIWER. I shall be very glad to make an explanation.

This bill was introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. NORBECK] at the request of the Federal Farm Loan Board. Hearings were held upon the bill by a subcommittee, of which I had the honor to be chairman. Those hearings disclosed that intermediate credit banks at this time have considerable difficulty in placing their debentures upon a favorable basis; indeed, in recent times it has been necessary to resort to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in order to find ample and abundant funds for the use of farmers borrowing from the intermediate credit banks. The bill is supported by the Federal Farm Loan Board, by the Treasury Department, and also by the Federal Reserve Board. It is likewise supported by the National Grange, the American Farm Bureau Federation, the Farmers' Union, and various other groups.

The chief purpose of the bill is to give to the intermediate credit banks the additional facility of acquiring funds through the Federal reserve system. It permits the debentures of the intermediate credit banks to be discounted with the Federal reserve system. The bill will result, if enacted, in a lowering of rates of interest—I can not tell the Senator the exact amount of saving in interest rates—but it will lower the cost of obtaining money; that is, the rate upon the debentures which is paid intermediate credit banks will be lowered in an amount which is estimated as being from 1 to 1½ per cent. That saving in interest ought to be, and I think will be, translated back to the borrowers from the system.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

Mr. STEIWER. Of course.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is the report of the committee unanimous on the bill?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I am impressed that the Senator in his statement has justified the provisions of the bill. I have no objection to its consideration.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 202 (a) of Title II of the Federal farm loan act, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, ch. 8, sec. 1031), is hereby amended by substituting a semicolon for the period at the end of clause (3) and adding thereto the following new matter: "and to accept drafts or bills of exchange issued or drawn by any such association when secured by warehouse receipts and/or shipping documents covering staple agricultural products as herein provided."

SEC. 2. Section 205 of Title II of the Federal farm loan act, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, ch. 8, sec. 1061), is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new matter: "In the event that there shall be an impairment of the paid-in capital of any Federal intermediate credit bank, the Farm Loan Board, at such time or times as it deems advisable, may determine and assess the amount thereof against the other Federal intermediate credit banks on such equitable basis of apportionment as it shall prescribe. Each bank against which such an assessment is made shall, out of its surplus and/or to an extent up to 50 per cent of its net earnings, in accordance with the terms of such assessment, pay the amount thereof as soon as possible to the bank having the impairment. In such event payments into the surplus fund and payments of the franchise tax prescribed by this chapter shall be determined on the basis of the net earnings remaining after providing for the payment of any such assessment."

SEC. 3. Section 206 (b) of Title II of the Federal farm loan act, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, ch. 8, sec. 1072), is hereby amended (effective January 1, 1932) by striking out the first two sentences of said section and substituting therefor the following new matter: "After all necessary expenses of a Federal intermediate credit bank have been paid or provided for, the net earnings shall be paid into a surplus fund until it shall amount to 100 per cent of the subscribed capital stock of such bank, and thereafter 50 per cent of such earnings shall be paid into the surplus. Whenever the surplus thus paid in shall have been impaired it shall be fully restored before payment of the franchise tax herein prescribed. After the aforesaid requirements of this section have been fully met and, except as otherwise provided in this act, 50 per cent of the net earnings shall be paid to the United States as a franchise tax."

SEC. 4. Section 207 of Title II of the Federal farm loan act, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, ch. 8, sec. 1081), is hereby amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and substituting a colon together with a proviso as follows: "Provided, That in view of the liability of all Federal intermediate credit banks for the debentures and other such obligations of each bank under this act, the banks shall, in accordance with rules, regulations, and orders of the Federal Farm Loan Board, enter into adequate agreements and arrangements among themselves by which funds shall be transferred and/or made available from time to time for the payment of all such debentures and other such obligations and the interest thereon when due in accordance with the terms thereof."

SEC. 5. The second paragraph of section 13 (a) of the Federal reserve act, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, ch. 3, sec. 349), is hereby amended by adding thereto a new sentence as follows: "Any Federal reserve bank may also, subject to regulations and limitations to be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board, discount notes payable to and bearing the indorsement of any Federal intermediate credit bank, covering loans or advances made by such bank pursuant to the provisions of section 202 (a) of Title II of the Federal farm loan act, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, ch. 8, sec. 1031), which have maturities at the time of discount of not more than nine months, exclusive of days of grace, and which are secured by notes, drafts, or bills of exchange eligible for rediscount by Federal reserve banks."

SEC. 6. The seventh paragraph of section 13 of the Federal reserve act, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, ch. 3, sec. 347), is hereby amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma and adding thereto the words "or by the deposit or pledge of debentures or other such obligations of Federal intermediate credit banks which are eligible for purchase by Federal reserve banks under section 13 (a) of this act."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the calendar.

LOANS ON ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to recur to Order of Business 510, being the bill (S. 1251) relating to the making of loans to veterans upon their adjusted-service certificates. I understand the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] objected to the consideration of the bill when it was called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I say that the bill if enacted would cost some $70,000,000, and it seems to me that it can not be passed in just a few moments during the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

FALSE ADVERTISING—ADDRESS BY JAMES A. HORTON

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an address on the False Advertising Problem and the Powers of the Federal Trade Commission with Respect Thereto, delivered before the Advertising Club of New York on April 14, by James A. Horton, assistant chief examiner of the Federal Trade Commission, may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It is a pleasing experience to meet with the members of the Advertising Club of New York, and in coming before you I am impressed by the realization that we have much in common. While we may approach our respective problems from distinctly different angles, I feel, however, that our ultimate goal in many respects is the same.

May I depart from the accepted order and, like the minister who bases his sermon on a text from the Scriptures, take as my text a quotation from an article appearing in a publication devoted to the interests of the fourth estate. However, in so doing, I assure you that I am not going to deliver a sermon. The text to which I refer is as follows:

"Advertising is by far too valuable an instrument in modern commerce to permit of the vandal practices of the exceptional merchant or distributor who suppresses his conscience to make temporary gains at the expense of the public."

With this thought in mind I would first like to discuss the work of the Federal Trade Commission, particularly in relation to advertising matters in which you are vitally interested, as its regulatory activities and the conditions and circumstances under which its corrective powers are applied may have and often do have a positive and determinative influence on the manner in which you conduct your respective businesses.

The commission is an independent establishment of the Government, the control of which is lodged in five commissioners appointed by the President. The act creating the commission declares in section 5 "that unfair methods of competition in commerce are hereby declared unlawful," the commission being "empowered and directed to prevent persons, partnerships, or corporations * * * from using unfair methods of competition in commerce." The act authorizes the commission, whenever it has reason to believe that any person, partnership, or corporation has been or is using unfair methods of competition in commerce, provided it appears that a proceeding in respect thereof would be in the public interest, to institute a proceeding by complaint against such party. The commission, after a hearing and on proper showing, may issue its order requiring the party to cease and desist from the unlawful methods. The function of the commission is remedial, no authority being vested in it to impose penalties. The commission is given discretion in determining in the first instance what constitutes an unfair method of competition, and its findings as to the facts, if supported by testimony, are conclusive.

I wish to assure you at this juncture that the commission in its activities is not in any sense attempting to exercise the power of censorship, and that it emphatically does not desire any such power. Neither is the commission attempting to arbitrarily impose its views or desires on the advertiser, as this would constitute a bureaucratic interference with business, repugnant indeed to salutary and free competition, and wholly undesirable alike to the public and to business.

There is, however, as I view it, the need for impartial governmental regulation, and in this impartial spirit the commission does assert its proper jurisdictional powers in every case, and to require in those cases involving the use of advertisements that such advertisements be true in substance. Therefore, whenever the necessity arises, the commission should and will exercise its remedial powers to the fullest extent, in order to protect the public, as well as the honest competitor, and thus through the proper and wise, but forceful application of its remedial powers, enable business to function toward its highest development.

The commission proceeds in cases of false and misleading advertising on the theory that such practices constitute unfair methods of competition, and as this term is not defined in the statute it is perhaps desirable to ascertain the meaning of this term as defined by the courts.

The Supreme Court as early as 1920 in a leading case stated that—

"The words 'unfair methods of competition' are not defined by the statute, and their exact meaning is in dispute. It is for the courts, not the commission, ultimately to determine as matter of law what they include. They are clearly inapplicable to practices never heretofore regarded as opposed to good morals because characterized by deception, bad faith, fraud, or oppression, or as against public policy because of their dangerous tendency to unduly hinder competition or create monopoly." * * *

The court, speaking in another case, stated:

"In the nature of things it was impossible to describe and define in advance just what constituted unfair competition, and in the final analysis it became a question of law, after the facts were ascertained, whether such facts constitute unfair competition in business, for the test of fairness, as of fraud, is the application by the law of moral standard to the actions of men."

It became apparent, then, after consideration of the language of the court in these cases that business practices opposed to good morals, because characterized by deception, bad faith, or fraud, amount to unfair methods of competition over which the commission clearly has jurisdiction in any case of false, fraudulent, deceptive, or misleading advertisements used to exploit in interstate commerce a business founded on such deception, bad faith, or fraud.

It is well, perhaps, to illustrate this by reference to a few selected cases defining the powers and jurisdiction of the commission. You will recall that section 5 of the act does not define any standard of conduct for the guidance of the commission, so we must look to the decisions of the various courts.

In the Winsted Hosiery case the Supreme Court, in reversing the circuit court of appeals, held it to be an unfair method of competition for the Winsted company to use the word "wool" in connection with the sale of knit goods composed of wool and cotton, and the circuit court of appeals, in affirming the commission's cease and desist order in the Royal Baking Powder case, stated:

"The reversal of the case (Federal Trade Commission v. Winsted Hosiery Co.) by the Supreme Court has established the principle that advertisements which are false in fact constitute an unfair method of competition, although it was one commonly practiced and not intended to mislead the trade. The labeling of commodities in such a way as to deceive the public is an unfair method of competition."

The commission in this case found that the respondent was using false and misleading labeling and advertising, which was calculated and designed to deceive the purchasing public and that the method of branding and advertising also tended unfairly to hinder and obstruct the business of respondent's competitors. The concluding sentence of the court's opinion is forceful and expressive:

"The purpose of the Congress in creating the Federal Trade Commission was aimed at just such dishonest practices, and business concerns that resort to dishonest devices of this nature must understand that they can not add to their revenues or maintain their business standing by methods of competition which the law brands as 'unfair' and therefore unlawful."

In the Guarantee Veterinary Co. case the testimony showed that the respondent had published advertising matter containing false and misleading statements, and analysis of respondent's product showed it lacked 10 of the 16 ingredients stated in its advertisements. The court, in affirming the commission's order, stated:

"The testimony shows conclusively that the petitioners had been publishing advertising matter containing false and misleading statements and had used an unfair method of commerce, and we think the commission was quite within its right in issuing the order in the form it did. In such cases the commission must exercise its discretion in view of all the circumstances."

The purpose of the law in this respect is well defined in the language of the court in a leading case when it stated that—

"The law is not made for the protection of experts but for the public—that vast multitude which includes the ignorant, the unthinking, and the credulous who, in making purposes, do not stop to analyze but are governed by appearances and general impressions."

The query propounded by the court in a recent unfair competition case is distinctly pertinent to and emphasizes the proposition of law just announced and in my opinion carries it to a logical conclusion.

"Why should a vendor be able to collect from a purchaser, as a part of the purchase price, money which has been spent in an effort to mislead that very purchaser in making that very purchase?"

The order of the commission was challenged by the respondent in a recent case in which the use of false and misleading advertising was alleged; and the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, in affirming the order to cease and desist, held that the following propositions of law fully supported the ruling of the commission:

"False and misleading representations resulting in deception of the public are matter of public interest which the commission has power to prevent.

"The commission's jurisdiction is not limited to practices which tend to create a monopoly but embrace false and fraudulent advertising, misbranding, and other practices which result in deceiving the public. Such practices injure competitors who do not use them."

"Practices opposed to good morals because characterized by deception, bad faith, fraud, and oppression are unfair methods of competition."

The courts, practically without exception, have placed the seal of their condemnation on all businesses based upon deception or fraud of the public, and the commission, in the exercise of its discretionary powers, is guided by established principles of law and equity as defined by the courts, and the powers of the commission with respect to this class of cases have been generally upheld.

The recent decision of the Supreme Court in the so-called Raladam case appears to have created some misunderstanding with respect to the jurisdiction and power of the commission, and I wish to make brief reference to that decision in order to present to you its salient points.

The commission, in substance, ordered the respondent "to cease and desist from representing that its preparation is a scientific method for treating obesity, is the result of scientific research, or that the formula is a scientific formula; and from representing its preparation as a remedy for obesity, unless accompanied by the statement that it can not be taken safely except under medical advice and direction." The court in its consideration of the case stated that:

"Findings, supported by evidence, warrant the conclusion that the preparation is one which can not be used generally with safety to physical health except under medical direction and advice. If the necessity of protecting the public against dangerously misleading advertisements of a remedy sold in interstate commerce were all that is necessary to give the commission jurisdiction, the order could not successfully be assailed. But that is not all."

The court then expressed the view that—

"The power of the commission to take steps looking to the issue of an order to desist depends upon the existence of three distinct prerequisites: (1) That the methods complained of are unfair; (2) that they are methods of competition in commerce; and (3) that a proceeding by the commission to prevent the use of the methods appears to be in the interest of the public"— and having assumed the existence of the first and third requisites, held that:

"It is obvious that the word 'competition' imports the existence of present or potential competitors, and the unfair methods must be such as injuriously affect or tend thus to affect the business of these competitors—that is to say, the trader whose methods are assailed as unfair must have present or potential rivals in trade whose business will be, or is likely to be, lessened or otherwise injured."

Its effect is simply to place on the commission the burden of proving competition and that the practices of respondent substantially injure or tend to injure the business of competitors. You may, therefore, be assured that the commission is proceeding vigorously in that "impartial spirit" to enforce the law in relation to false, misleading, and fraudulent advertising, thus affording protection to competitors as well as the public.

The commission, acting in the public interest, has adopted several methods for the prevention and elimination of unfair practices which are injurious to the public and to competitors, the principal method being that of procedure by formal complaint, charging a named respondent with violation of the law.

The commission had pending as of June 30, 1931, 225 formal complaints, of which number, 110 involved false, misleading, and fraudulent advertising, misbranding, and misrepresentation in the advertisement and sale of various products.

The commission, in addition to its statutory procedure by formal complaint, has adopted the policy of settling cases by stipulation between the commission and proposed respondent. This practice expedites the settlement of cases and is followed in those cases where the respondent expresses a desire to cooperate with the commission and voluntarily cease and desist from the alleged unfair practices. This procedure avoids the time and expense of litigation and accomplishes within a comparatively short time the cessation of unfair practices. It is in the nature of a privilege extended a respondent and is entirely within the discretion of the commission. These stipulations are drawn to conform to the decisions of the courts, and, in the absence of such decisions, to conform to precedents and rulings established by the commission.

The privilege of settling a case by stipulation, however, is not extended to those respondents whose businesses or practices are fraudulent, it being the opinion of the commission that the protection of the public and competitors demands the statutory procedure by formal complaint and public order to cease and desist. The commission, after deleting the name of a respondent, issues a statement of the facts and a description of the acts deemed to be unfair, this publicity being in the nature of a guide to the business world and to the public. At the close of the last fiscal year some 837 stipulations had been approved and accepted by the commission, of which number more than 600 involved false and misleading advertising, misbranding, or misrepresentation.

The commission has recently created a body known as the special board of investigation to handle certain types of cases based on alleged false and misleading advertising appearing in newspapers, magazines, and periodicals. In this class of cases the commission usually directs that the publisher and advertising agency be joined as parties respondent in the complaint against the advertiser, but affords the agency or publisher opportunity to avoid being thus joined by stipulating to abide the result of the proceedings against the advertiser.

The advertiser is granted a hearing and is offered an opportunity to stipulate that it will cease the unfair practices. The board, as of June 30, 1931, had effected 119 such stipulations and had pending 408 cases.

I have been requested to cite you some typical examples of false and misleading advertising and show wherein the advertisement offends, but before doing this I would like to make some brief observations with respect thereto.

The rule of construction applied to a false and misleading advertisement considers the advertisement in its entirety, the question of whether any particular statement is true or otherwise not being the pertinent question; the really pertinent question is whether the advertisement as a whole is calculated to deceive.

The impression seems to exist among many advertisers that even where the contact advertisement is false and misleading, if full disclosure is made before the sale is consummated, the illegality of the original advertisement is cured. The purpose of advertising I may state is simply to enable the vendor to form contact with the prospective purchaser and open up negotiations. When that has been done, advertising has served its purpose and that which remains constitutes salesmanship.

As stated by the Supreme Court, "Advertising is merely identification and description, apprising of quality and place. It has no other object than to draw attention to the article to be sold, and the acquisition of the article to be sold constitutes the only inducement to its purchase." Therefore, if the vendor by means of false and misleading advertising forms contact with a prospective purchaser, he may be guilty of unfair competition even though he discloses the truth to the purchaser before the sale is consummated. Disclosure of the truth at such time is no defense. The reason for this is quite simple. The mere fact that the advertiser has formed this contact gives to the advertiser an unfair competitive advantage over his competitor when the contact has been established by statements or representations false and misleading in character.

I deem it important to call to your attention that as stated by the court:

"A method of competition, inherently unfair, does not cease to be unfair because the falsity of the manufacturer's representation has become so well known to the trade that dealers, as distinguished from consumers, are no longer deceived. The honest manufacturer's business may suffer, not merely through a competitor's deceiving his direct customer, the retailer, but also through the competitor's putting into the hands of the retailer an unlawful instrument, which enables the retailer to increase his own sales of the dishonest goods, thereby lessening the market for the honest product."

From which it logically follows that a person who furnishes another with the means of consummating a fraud is a wrongdoer and may be held liable under the law of unfair competition.

DISCUSSION OF SPECIFIC CASES

It may be stated that with very few exceptions there is no known cure for disease and that, generally speaking, nature, assisted by proper medication, diet, etc., is the effective agent in restoring normal health. Advertising matter, therefore, dealing with drug products must not contain any false statement of curative or therapeutic effect.

The commission, in this phase of its activities, necessarily works in close cooperation with the Food and Drug Administration of the Department of Agriculture. The food and drugs act, however, applies only to false and fraudulent statements dealing with the curative or therapeutic effect of drugs when these statements appear on or are contained in the package or label. It does not concern itself with the collateral advertisement of such products in newspapers, magazines, and periodicals. It is necessary to prove, in cases of misbranding arising under the food and drugs act, first, "that the label, carton, or circular carries some statement, design, or device regarding the contents of the package or the ingredients in the mixture which is false and misleading in some particular; and, second, that the statement made or the design or device carried on the label or carton or in the circular regarding the curative or therapeutic effects of the same are false and fraudulent." It therefore becomes apparent that even though the labeling of a drug product conforms to the requirements of the food and drugs act it may yet be represented in a false, misleading, or fraudulent manner with respect to its curative or therapeutic effects in collateral advertising matter.

There is developing a rule of law to the effect that a manufacturer of a proprietary remedy, drug, or food product advertised and sold in interstate commerce whose labeling comes within the jurisdiction of the Food and Drug Administration may not in his collateral advertising extend his claims beyond those to which he is legally entitled under the food and drugs act. This simply means that where a proprietary remedy, for instance, is misrepresented in the advertising literature of the manufacturer or vendor apart from the package or label, the commission is clearly warranted in taking corrective action against such false, misleading, or fraudulent advertising matter. No one can dispute the assertion that the health and well-being of the public is of fundamental importance; and as this class of merchandise is sold primarily through the medium of advertising, it becomes the duty of the commission to prevent the dissemination of false, misleading, and fraudulent statements in collateral advertisements when these statements and representations directly affect the health of the public.

Within the past few years we have witnessed the development of paid-testimonial advertising and its use in fields hitherto undreamed of, producing a situation in the field of advertising that is fraught with grave possibilities. This type of advertising has received the condemnation of the commission, and in cases involving its use it has been held that the advertisement must disclose on its face that a consideration has been given for its use.

The commission has issued a number of complaints, charging the use of unfair methods of competition based on the publication by respondents of advertisements featuring testimonials or indorsements from various persons, allegedly obtained and consent for their use secured by the payment of money or other valuable consideration. I will set out for your information the basis for this action in a typical complaint issued by the commission.

"The methods of advertising used by respondent have had, and do have, the capacity and tendency to confuse, mislead, and deceive members of the public into the belief that such indorsements or testimonials are freely and voluntarily given without inducement and without any consideration whatsoever, and that they express the unbiased and disinterested opinions of such indorsers. Said methods have the tendency and capacity to confuse, mislead, and deceive members of the public by producing an unwarranted and exaggerated idea of the merits of such indorsements, which they would not have if it were stated in conjunction therewith that such indorsers received money or other valuable considerations for giving the same and for permitting their use commercially. Said act, practices, representations, and methods used by respondent have the capacity and tendency to induce members of the public to purchase and use said * * *, because of the erroneous beliefs engendered as above set forth, and to divert trade to respondent from competitors engaged in the sale of * * * in interstate commerce."

An order of the commission to cease and desist from this practice has been challenged; and as the case is now pending in the United States circuit court of appeals, I must necessarily refrain from further discussion of this subject, at least in its legal aspect.

It impresses me, however, purely from the attitude of good business that if advertisements are based on the portrayal of the intrinsic worth of the article as a quality product, and the advertiser refrains from capitalizing the prestige of movie actresses and other celebrities, and trading on their reputations, he will create for his business more tangible value and lasting good will that will exist for generations after the fame of these celebrities has been forgotten.

I realize possibly there is some news value in this method of advertising, but it is my strong belief that the public will seriously question not only the ethics of this method but the merits of the product thus advertised. It is perhaps unnecessary for me to remind you that once you destroy the faith of the American people in the honesty and truthfulness of advertising, you destroy at the same time your most valuable asset. I want to impress on you in all sincerity not only the desirability but the absolute necessity of adopting and rigidly adhering to the policy of honesty in advertising—a policy that you may be assured will create for you that most valuable of all business assets—good will. The truth of this statement may be further impressed on you when I remind you that the courts have explicitly stated that "the money invested in advertising is as much a part of the business as if invested in buildings or machinery," and the courts will protect the good will of a business that is created not only because of the worth of the product but also by reason of the "ingenious, attractive, and persistent manner in which they have been advertised."

A former president of your organization, Mr. Gilbert T. Hodges, with keen foresight has stated that "the biggest job * * * is to build greater respect and confidence in advertising. We must educate the consumer to believe that advertising is a guaranty of quality." Apropos of this same thought and projecting it still further I had occasion to state in a recent address that "As it was found necessary to enact the food and drugs act in order to secure the purity of foods and drugs and thus protect the health of the public, so will, in my opinion, the continuation of false, deceptive, and fraudulent practices in the advertisement and sale of these products result in the enactment of additional regulatory legislation which will make your problems increasingly difficult, but will give to the public adequate protection."

I do not, of course, claim any power of prophecy in this respect; but for your information and consideration, permit me to read some excerpts from a bill introduced in the Senate last January by Senator DAVID I. WALSH, of Massachusetts, dealing in part with the subject we have been discussing. In referring to "unfair methods of competition" and "unfair trade practices," the bill provides, in part, that—

"These terms also specifically include all acts of every kind and nature which might tend to mislead or deceive competitors, the public, or the ultimate consumer, such as misstatements, express or implied, oral or written, whether contained in letters, circulars, advertisements, or on labels, containers, or otherwise, as to the quality, purity, or condition of the goods offered for sale; * * * or as to the nature, character or identity or relative or effective quantity of the raw materials or ingredients or the process or conditions entering into the manufacture or production thereof; * * * or as to the purpose for which the same may be used; or as to the use to which the same may be applied; or as to the effect produced by the use thereof; or as to the tests, indorsements, or certification thereof by others; or as to the voluntary nature of paid testimonials not clearly designated as having been paid for; * * *."

I refrain from commenting on these provisions except to state that they reflect an aroused, enlightened public opinion that will ultimately prevail; that will insist on the creation of an effective method of regulation or control of advertising, engendered in part by the belief that, as advertising affects the health, well-being, and economic prosperity of our Nation, the public is entitled to protection against false, misleading, and fraudulent representations or inducements in the appeal of the advertiser. This will be accomplished, in my opinion, either through legislation or by voluntary action on the part of those primarily interested.

In this connection I have been impressed by the movement, current in your ranks, seeking a national conference on advertising and selling, for the purpose of formulating a code of standards and practices, and to devise a method of enforcement. I believe it to be a highly commendable project. Properly organized and effectively controlled, it may be the agency that will, with sincere cooperation, compel the cessation of those "vandal practices" which are bringing advertising into general disrepute. Likewise, the necessity for strict governmental regulation may be avoided to a great extent when business takes the initiative in establishing self-government, formulating its own rules of business conduct and, in cooperation with the Government, achieve the voluntary elimination of those practices deemed illegal, unfair, or unethical. This principle of self-regulation in business has met with general approval and because of the benefits to be derived therefrom merits your most serious consideration. I am inclined to believe that a plan of this kind wisely directed by those who possess a sympathetic understanding of your problems, working in cooperation with your Government, will maintain high ethical standards in the advertising profession and assist materially in the reestablishment of the confidence of the public in the honesty, sincerity, and integrity of advertising—properly termed the great motive force in our commercial life.

ALABAMA SENATORIAL CONTEST

Mr. McNARY. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of Senate Resolution 199.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 199), reported by Mr. GEORGE and Mr. BRATTON from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, as follows:

Resolved, That JOHN H. BANKHEAD is hereby declared to be a duly elected Senator of the United States from the State of Alabama for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1931, and is entitled to a seat as such.

Mr. BLAINE obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cutting	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Dale	Jones	Schall
Bailey	Dickinson	Kean	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dill	Kendrick	Shipstead
Barkley	Fess	Keyes	Shortridge
Bingham	Fletcher	La Follette	Smoot
Black	Frazier	Lewis	Steiwer
Blaine	George	Logan	Stephens
Borah	Glass	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Bratton	Glenn	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Brookhart	Goldsborough	McNary	Townsend
Broussard	Gore	Metcalf	Trammell
Bulkley	Hale	Moses	Tydings
Byrnes	Harrison	Neely	Vandenberg
Capper	Hastings	Norbeck	Walcott
Caraway	Hatfield	Norris	Walsh, Mass.
Carey	Hawes	Nye	Waterman
Connally	Hayden	Oddie	Watson
Copeland	Hebert	Patterson	White
Costigan	Howell	Reed
Couzens	Hull	Robinson, Ark.

Mr. AUSTIN. I desire to state that the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] is absent on the business of the Senate, and will be absent all day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, as I understand this contest, there is no charge that there was a corrupt use of money either in the primary or in the election in Alabama in 1930. There is no charge that there was any excessive use of money either in the primary or in the election, nor that there was any fraud committed through the use of money either in the primary or in the election. There is no charge and no evidence that Senator Bankhead was in any way directly or indirectly or remotely connected with the alleged errors and omissions on the part of election officers as charged in the primary or the election in Alabama.

The primary election law has become so closely associated and intimately connected with the general election that it may well be said that it is a part and parcel of the election machinery in this country.

The primary election law, therefore, has become a fixed policy, and the system has developed within the last quarter of a century with a view of accommodating the electors of the respective States, that they might have as full and free privilege in directing the affairs of the respective parties to which they may belong as the several States provide.

Mr. President, I have a predilection, therefore, in favor of a primary system that affords the greatest opportunity, the greatest freedom of expression that may possibly be conferred upon citizens of the respective States. I think that a free and open primary promotes good government, promotes responsive government, and is altogether essential in the conduct of our democracy, using the expression—hackneyed, perhaps—that the cure for democracy is more democracy; and the primary election system is designed to afford that greater measure of democracy.

Following that general conception of the purpose of the primary election, the several States have set up their particular methods for the nomination of candidates for public office by direct vote of the people. Therein lies the jurisdiction respecting a primary system. It is a matter for the several States to determine in their own way what system the States may adopt, what restrictions and regulations the States may initiate, respecting the primary election. Therefore, I dismiss from consideration my own feeling respecting the particular kind of primary election law set up in the State of Alabama.

This is not the forum where I would choose to discuss the merits or demerits of Alabama's election law. I had this conception of the situation early in the hearing of this contest; and I suggested to one of the gentlemen interested that so far as the primary election law of Alabama was concerned, he was appealing in the wrong forum; that his appeal should be made to the people of the State of Alabama.

There the question of what kind of a law should be enacted could be determined, what restrictions should be established, what regulations should be enacted into law within that jurisdiction. That was the proper place for the determination of the question of the particular form of a direct nominating system.

However, Mr. President, I also hold to the proposition that the Senate of the United States has the constitutional power to pass upon that question and other questions relating to the form of elections when a citizen of a State is certified as the person elected to a seat in the United States Senate. The power of the Senate, of course, is supreme. It can investigate the conduct of candidates in the primary and it can, of course, investigate the conduct of candidates in the election for the purpose of arriving at a decision as to whether or not the person is a fit person to sit in the Senate of the United States. It can investigate the question of the excessive use of money and corruption in a primary on the part of the successful candidate in that primary who afterwards became the successful candidate in the election, whenever such person raps at the door of the United States Senate for admission. There is no doubt about the power of the Senate in this regard.

However, I also perceive the general rule to be that the Senate will not arbitrarily deny a seat to a representative of a sovereign State; that the Senate has no precedent, as I view the situation, where it has exercised arbitrarily its unlimited power to remove a Member of the United States Senate, or to declare his seat vacant.

But, Mr. President, in this particular contest none of those questions respecting the excessive use of money or the corrupt use of money has been raised; and, of course, such questions could not have been raised if we take the testimony that has been taken by the committee which investigated the election in Alabama in 1930.

I am not going to engage in any academic discussion of the power of the Senate in this respect; but I shall go to the direct question of whether or not the primary held in Alabama in 1930 was a valid primary, and whether or not the election following that primary was a valid election. I shall approach this proposition from a somewhat different angle than has been presented, and I shall call attention to the provisions of the Code of Alabama to justify my position.

In the State of Alabama, under the constitution of that State, no party is required to hold a primary election. That is, the State of Alabama by its constitution has declared that a party primary shall not be compulsory. By the same constitution it is provided, however, that whenever a party chooses to select its nominee by direct vote of the people under the primary system, the primary may and can be regulated by the sovereign power of the State, the State legislature. So the State of Alabama has set up a system of laws respecting the conduct of primary elections; and I desire to point out in this connection that these primaries held in the State of Alabama are party primaries, so characterized and so designated in the general discussion of the subject. The party has certain control over the primaries, no matter what party it may be.

The State of Alabama has defined what is a party. I desire to quote the Alabama Code, so that the discussion in which I am engaged, if the debate is read by any one, may have continuity of thought, and afford an opportunity for an intelligent appreciation of what the law and the facts are.

Under the Code of Alabama a political party is defined by section 602 as follows:

> An assemblage or organization of electors which at the general election for State and county officers then next preceding the primary, cast more than 25 per cent of the entire vote cast in any county, is hereby declared to be a political party within the meaning of this chapter within such county; and an assemblage or organization of electors which at the general election for State officers then next preceding the primary cast more than 25 per cent of the entire vote cast in the State is declared to be a political party within the meaning of this chapter for such State.

So the party consists of an assemblage or organization of electors. They constitute the party.

The statute of Alabama does not undertake to define the qualifications of the members of that assemblage or the members of the organization of electors which cast the 25 per cent of the votes. It has no reference to what qualifications shall be imposed upon electors in that particular connection, except, of course, the constitutional qualifications, and qualifications laid down by law, which relate to all electors regardless of their party affiliations.

How is the primary election originated in the State of Alabama? Not by operation of law; but a primary election is brought into being in the State of Alabama by action of the executive committees of the respective parties. The power to call for a party primary is conferred upon the party, and the party, of course, exercises its authority through the duly constituted committees within its own organization.

After a party has acted through its duly constituted committee, and determines that there shall be a primary election within the State of Alabama, from that moment, whether the action has been by the passage of a resolution or some other evidence of the action of the party through its committee, there comes into being in the State of Alabama a primary election for that party. Immediately upon the coming into existence or being of a primary election for that party, the sovereign power of the State then steps in and determines when the primary shall be held. In presidential years, as I recall, the election is fixed by statute for May; in other years, the primary election is fixed for the month of August.

After a party, acting through its constituted authority, has declared for a primary, there is no power in the party, and no power in any of its committees, or any of its internal organization, to abandon that primary.

The primary has become at that moment a part of the law of the State of Alabama, and no action of the party acting through any committee can nullify that primary or prevent the primary from being held. So that after the party has once acted, has once called into being a primary, from that moment that primary is controlled and directed by the sovereign power of the State of Alabama, with only one definite exception, and with a possible other exception, which I desire to discuss.

The one definite exception is this: That whether the party acts according to its constitution, if it has one, or acts according to the by-laws of the party, if it has by-laws, or acts according to the traditional practices and principles of the party—by whatever method the party does act, that party has a right to determine the qualifications of those who may become candidates of the party at the primary election fixed by the law.

There has been much confusion during the hearing of this contest before the committee, in my opinion, respecting the question of the qualifications of electors in a party primary. That was inevitable, and it was inevitable for the reason, as I believe can be pointed out, that the statutes of Alabama respecting the qualifications of electors in party primaries are ambiguous, uncertain, and indefinite. If the position of the contestant were to be followed, then there would naturally, as I shall point out, grow up the most fantastic situations, the most ridiculous situations, and, in fact, the most impossible situations. I shall call to the attention of the Senate some illustrations which will show how ridiculous and fantastic would be the result if we were to follow the literal language of the Alabama statute referred to in the debate as section 612.

Before discussing what appear to me clearly to be ambiguities, indefiniteness, and contradictions, I point out that section 672 of the Alabama Code provides as follows as to the executive committee of a political party:

> Any executive committee of a party may fix assessments or other qualifications as it may deem necessary, for persons desiring to become candidates for nomination to office at a primary election.

Then there follow some details with reference to other matters which have no connection primarily with the question of the qualifications of a candidate.

Section 612 provides:

> All persons who are qualified electors under the general election laws of this State shall have the right to participate in such primary elections, subject to such political or other qualifications as may be prescribed by the State executive committee or governing body of such political party for its candidate.

Therein lies the difficulty; therein lies the ambiguity, the uncertainty. If the statute were to be taken literally, we can all well conceive how ridiculous the situation would be in the State of Alabama if the qualifications fixed by the executive committee for a candidate automatically attached to the electors.

Counsel for contestee has used some very outstanding illustrations which point the way we would find ourselves going if we accepted the literal interpretation of the statute. I can conceive of but one situation where the qualification fixed for the candidate automatically would attach to the electors. I can best illustrate that, perhaps, by using one example. Let it be understood that when I speak of qualifications, I refer to those other than the constitutional qualifications, and the qualifications prescribed by law.

Suppose the Republican Party in the State of Alabama, through its executive committee, fixed as one of the qualifications of a candidate for governor that he must be a member of some race other than the white race. Assume that the executive committee of the Republican Party should say that a candidate for governor in the State of Alabama must be a person of colored blood. If that qualification prescribed by the candidate automatically attached to the electors, then of course no one could vote in a Republican primary in the State of Alabama unless he had in his veins the blood of the colored race.

Suppose the Republican Party, in defining the qualifications of a candidate for United States Senator in the same primary, should prescribe as a qualification that such person should be one possessing "lily white" blood; that is, that no one but a person who was known as belonging to the white race should be a candidate for nomination for the office of United States Senator.

Then, under a literal interpretation of the statute, that qualification would automatically attach to the elector. If the qualifications which I have pointed out automatically attach to the electors respecting the qualifications that were applied to the candidate for governor and the candidate for United States Senator, neither the white race nor the colored race could vote in the State of Alabama.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. DILL. The Democratic committee does fix as a qualification a restriction to whites only, does it not?

Mr. BLAINE. Qualification for the candidate?

Mr. DILL. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. My understanding is that they fixed that qualification saying, "only a white person."

Mr. DILL. Only a qualified white elector?

Mr. BLAINE. That is my understanding.

Mr. DILL. That is restrictive, and kept out the colored people.

Mr. BLAINE. I think undoubtedly it did in the election, but not because of the resolution relating to the qualification fixed for a candidate.

Mr. DILL. No.

Mr. BLAINE. I have here the resolution adopted by the executive committee of the Democratic Party. I invite the attention of the Senator from Washington to the fact that the same qualifications were fixed by the resolution respecting race for electors in the primary.

Let me use another apt illustration—and I am assuming imaginary offices which might exist and which could exist under the laws of any State having capital punishment. Suppose the executive committee of the Democratic Party of the State of Alabama should fix the qualifications for a candidate for a State officer known as the State executioner.

The executive committee fixes the qualifications for State executioner as those of a male person, and it would be a very appropriate qualification. Then assuming that they had a state-wide nursing department and they had an official State nurse, a State officer, and the executive committee fixed the qualifications of a candidate for the office of State nurse as those of a female. If the qualifications fixed for candidates in those two cases automatically attach to the electors, there could no one vote for either of those officers in the primary.

So I say that if a literal interpretation is to be given to the section, we meet these impossible, fantastic, ridiculous situations.

But the legislature meant something when it enacted section 612. I have searched diligently to ascertain the reason why the legislature added to the law the words, "for its candidate." I have listened to the arguments which have been made. As I recall, counsel for the contestant argued that it was necessary for the legislature to amend the law and add the words, "for its candidate," on account of some decision that was rendered by the courts of Texas. I examined that decision. I could find nothing in the decision that would impel the legislature of the State of Alabama to add the words "for its candidate."

As I view that decision, it had no relationship whatever to the problem upon which the State of Alabama was legislating. Then, we find that subsequent to that amendment, in a recent act of legislature it was provided that the executive committee could prescribe other and different qualifications as between candidates and electors. So the matter is altogether in confusion as to what section 612 means when it uses the words "for its candidate."

But I think it has application and a perfectly proper application to circumstances which might develop in the State of Alabama. Suppose that a party in the State of Alabama should fix qualifications for a candidate for office that would enlarge the field out of which those candidates might be selected. That would increase the number of electors qualified to vote. Applying the literal meaning of the statute to that illustration, then the electors or the class of electors would be enlarged to the extent of the field of candidates who would be permitted to submit themselves in a Democratic, Republican, Socialist, or any other party primary in the State of Alabama.

In other words, that statute can be applied to protect the citizens of the State in their full right of franchise within their party according to the definition set forth in the statute for that party.

My interpretation of section 612 is that in practical effect it can have no application whatever to an elector. We can imagine examples where it might apply, but those examples involve impractical situations which undoubtedly sensible men belonging to the executive committees of the respective parties would never suggest. But the qualifications of electors in a primary, in my opinion, are definitely and specifically fixed by the laws of the State of Alabama. I invite attention to section 624, which provides as follows:

> Any qualified elector who is also a member of a political party as herein defined, participating in a primary election, shall be entitled to vote at such primary election as shall receive the official primary election ballot of the political party and no other.

That is the test to be applied to the electors in the primary election of every party. The code of the State of Alabama does not set up any method by which the party may expel its membership. I assume through its history, its traditions, its practices, and its general methods, that certain implied qualifications have been set up by each party relating to members of the party; but when section 624 is read in connection with section 602, it is the assemblage or organization of electors which constitutes a party in the State of Alabama and those men and women are the members of the political party who participate in the primary election as a party and those members are entitled to vote at such primary and shall receive the official primary election ballot of the political party.

That gives the electors of the State of Alabama a possibility of generous participation in the primary election of Alabama and whether or not an elector shall cast his vote in that particular primary must be determined by the elector on his good conscience. If the election officers challenge that elector, he then has an opportunity to qualify; and if he can qualify, he will be permitted to cast his vote in that particular party primary.

Therefore I conclude on this proposition with the declaration that under section 672 the executive committee in any party may prescribe the qualifications of that party's candidates. That position has been sustained by the Supreme Court of the State of Alabama and is conceded by contestant. I need not review that case. It has been covered in the debate here on this matter.

However, Mr. President, in my opinion the executive committee has limitations upon its power even respecting qualifications for candidates. As I think has been pointed out in some decisions reviewed by Judge Thomas in his dissenting opinion, those qualifications must come within the rule of reason. They must be reasonable qualifications. But who is there to say that when the Democratic Party, after its experience in 1928, with the defeat of its candidate for President, should not say, when the executive committee was possessed of that power lawfully under the statute, that any person who had not supported the candidate of the Democratic Party for the Presidency in 1928 should not be qualified as a candidate in the primary of 1930? That, I believe, is admitted to be a reasonable qualification under the Alabama law.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I understand the Senator is about closing his remarks on this subject.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; I am about closing my remarks on this subject.

Mr. BORAH. I wanted to get the Senator's views on one phase of this matter. The resolution which was adopted by the executive committee fixed the qualifications of the candidates?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. If it had gone no farther than to fix the qualifications of the candidates, the qualifications of the electors would, under section 612 of the Alabama Code, have followed those of the candidates, would they not?

Mr. BLAINE. In my opinion, no. I think the qualifications of the electors are fixed by section 624 instead of section 612; and that section 612, if literally interpreted, would be held to be void on the grounds of uncertainty and ambiguity.

Mr. BORAH. Then, the position of the Senator is that the Democratic executive committee in Alabama had power, under the different sections of the statute, to fix one qualification for electors and another qualification for candidates?

Mr. BLAINE. The executive committee had the power to fix one qualification for candidates, and I have grave doubt whether it could fix any other qualification for electors than that prescribed in section 624.

Mr. BORAH. Now, I should like to ask the Senator this question: Assuming that section 612 would require the executive committee to fix the same qualifications for electors that it fixed for candidates; in other words, assuming that under section 612 the committee having fixed the qualifications for candidates, the qualifications of the electors would be the same; nevertheless would the fact that the committee undertook to fix a different qualification render the primary invalid, or would it simply make it irregular?

Mr. BLAINE. As I contended at the beginning of my remarks, after the Democratic executive committee brought the primary into being there was nothing that that committee could do to nullify that primary. It might practice irregularities with reference to its powers and privileges, but those irregularities in no way would nullify or invalidate the primary.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, even if the committee had fixed a different qualification for candidates than that which it fixed for the electors, that would be an irregularity which would not go to the validity of the primary.

Mr. BLAINE. It would be a plain irregularity; it would have nothing to do with the validity and force of the primary. The primary itself having been brought into being, as I have stated, there is no power in the executive committee that could invalidate or nullify that primary. The committee may practice irregularities; they may go beyond their power in fixing the qualifications of an elector; but an elector has the right in the State of Alabama to go to the polls, and as a member of a party that participates in the primaries he has a right to vote in such primary and to receive the official primary election ballot of the political party which is participating in that primary. His rights are fixed. Whether or not he can maintain his position depends entirely upon the fact. If he comes within the qualifications of an elector, as set down by the constitution and laws of the State of Alabama and is actually a member of a political party in Alabama, he has his right to vote.

I can not set forth what the position of each elector may be in the State of Alabama respecting his party affiliations; that is a matter which rests with the conscience of the elector when he goes to the polls to vote, as I interpret the statute.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin whether he has given any consideration at all to the fact that the chairman of the Democratic executive committee announced that voters at the primary would not be permitted to write in the name of Senator Heflin or, as I recall, a man by the name of Locke for governor? Has the Senator given any consideration to the effect that would have upon the legality of the primary?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I have very carefully considered that proposition. I can conceive, and I have observed, that in primary contests and in election contests many statements are given out for the purpose of misleading the electors, but one who is in the position of chairman of the Democratic executive committee in the State of Alabama could not by his declaration disqualify the electors. I assume that the electors in the State of Alabama, if they honestly believed that they had a right to vote in the primary, would have sufficient courage to challenge that statement if they believed the statement to be incorrect, irregular, or untrue. That is left, of course, to those who are going to exercise the right or privilege of electors. I might say, however, that, of course, a statement of that kind might have a very weighty effect in dissuading electors from doing certain things or the doing of certain things, whichever the case may be.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. In order that I may have the full effect of the Senator's argument, I desire him to assume that the executive committe itself adopted such a resolution, declaring that voters could not write on their ballots the names of candidates. Would the Senator think that such action by the executive committee would render the primary null and void?

Mr. BLAINE. My opinion respecting that is identical with my opinion respecting the operation of section 612, that, if the Democratic executive committee, assuming they had no power to do so but really did adopt such a resolution, and assuming the chairman of the committee gave out the information, it would be an irregularity which could not and would not nullify the primary. The primary is in being and irregularities on the part of a political party committee or of an election officer or of an individual citizen clearly can not and did not nullify the primary election in Alabama.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, does the Senator contend that the action of the Democratic executive committee of the State of Alabama, which upon its face excluded some persons from participating in the primary, assuming that the executive committee had no right to impose any such restrictions in the resolution, is a mere irregularity and does not make the resolution itself void?

Mr. BLAINE. I would contend that, even if the resolution were void and an absolute nullity, it would have nothing to do with the validity of the primary. The primary was in being; it was brought into being; thereupon there was no committee and no individual and no election officer public or otherwise who could nullify that primary. It would be an irregularity which of course, in my opinion, is cured by operation of law and other principles which I have not discussed, and I doubt if it is necessary to discuss them. That has been fully presented.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the Senator will permit one more interruption, then I will not bother him further. On page 6 of the minority views it appears that this question was propounded to Mr. Bankhead:

> If the committee refuses to comply with such request, do you favor the voters in the primary being given an opportunity to stamp the names of Heflin and Locke on the ballot and vote for them if they want to do so?

Mr. Bankhead's answer was:

> I shall not be a party to such a thing.

I just call the Senator's attention to that, and I thank the Senator for yielding to me.

Mr. BLAINE. I have considered that proposition very carefully. As I conceive the situation to be, it was not within the power of Mr. Bankhead or anyone else to nullify or make void the primary. If Mr. Bankhead, for instance, had advised that the executive committee of the Democratic Party create a sort of a set-up designedly for the specific purpose of keeping everybody out of the primary except himself and his friends, and if there was evidence to that effect which would connect Mr. Bankhead with that kind of a conspiracy, then the proposition would go to the point of whether or not Mr. Bankhead was a fit person to occupy a seat in the Senate of the United States; but there is no contention to that effect whatever and not even a suggestion to that effect.

The suggestion is that Mr. Bankhead, as I recall, expressed his perfect willingness that Mr. Heflin should have the right to run in the Democratic primary. That goes only to the question of good faith and the liberal attitude and broad citizenship of Senator Bankhead and does not reflect upon him except meritoriously, as I view it; and after the committee had adopted a certain resolution or given out certain orders, his expression thereafter could have no effect upon his purposes or motives that would in any way nullify or invalidate the election or attach to him any suggestion of misconduct. That is the view I take of that proposition.

So, Mr. President, I approach this question, as I suggested at the outset, with a predilection all in favor of a liberal primary system, one in which men and women would be entitled to be candidates and in which there would be freedom of the electors to select men and women of their choice.

I, therefore, approached the matter with a searching viewpoint; but because I entertain such an opinion regarding the primary-election system does not mean that the violation of my opinion as to what the primary-election system should be would justify the unseating of a Member of the United States Senate. The forum for the determination of the kind of primary election law to be provided in the State of Alabama is with the people of the State of Alabama and not with the Senate of the United States.

However, Mr. President, if any State should set up a system designedly for the purpose of excluding those clearly qualified, under our Constitution and the constitutions of the respective States, to vote in any primary, then the Senate of the United States might well say as to a person who would accept a nomination at the hands of a coterie willing to betray their State, not by the use of money, but by depriving men and women of their rights as electors, that such circumstances attached to his nomination that he might come under the characterization of a person unfit to occupy a seat in the United States Senate.

But, Mr. President, we are not facing that kind of a question, and my mind is not closed on that proposition. I am simply stating an extreme possibility.

I shall not review the law relating to how irregularities in primaries and in elections are cured. I think that matter has been fully covered. I do desire, however, to refer to some of the omissions and irregularities that were practiced during the election campaign. I will treat those questions very briefly, for the reason that they have been very well disposed of by Senators who have spoken upon this question.

I want to call attention to the irregularity complained about respecting the marking of the ballots.

I believe the statute requires that the ballots in the general election shall be numbered in ink.

In a report made by the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Privileges and Elections—I am using that for convenience—on page 2, it is stated as follows by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS]: The print is the confidential subcommittee print. I believe it has no other characterization. I do not find a number upon the print.

The Senator from Delaware said:

> I have heretofore pointed out that the Alabama law requires the inspectors of elections to number each ballot in ink. This number corresponds with a number on the poll list. The secrecy of the ballot is secured by providing that before the count is started the poll list shall be sealed and not again opened.

It has been demonstrated to my satisfaction that the provision relating to the numbering of the ballots in ink is directory, and not mandatory. It does not in any great degree guarantee the sanctity of the ballot. That is, it does not seem to me material whether the ballot is numbered in ink or in lead pencil. There is nothing special about the numbering of the ballot that guarantees the purity or the sanctity of the ballot. I desire to point out the circumstances that justify my comment just made.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I desire to call attention to the fact that on page 7, just following what the Senator has read, in making the report the chairman of the subcommittee distinctly called attention to a case in Alabama holding that it was directory and not mandatory, and that the votes ought to be counted unless fraud was shown; and I comment upon that in the report.

Mr. BLAINE. Is that in the subcommittee memorandum submitted by the Senator, or in the minority report?

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator will find it in what is now before the Senate, marked "Minority views," the report presented by myself, on page 7. The Senator was reading a little while ago touching the same subject. It is on the next page.

Mr. BLAINE. I am reading from one report, and the Senator is reading from another. I fear that there will be a misunderstanding. At any rate, whether the provision is directory or mandatory, it does not affect the validity of the election; and I confess that I have not studied the decision to which the Senator refers.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. If I correctly understood the Senator from Delaware, he said that the Supreme Court of Alabama held the statute to be directory, just as the Senator from Wisconsin now asserts.

Mr. BLAINE. Oh! I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. BRATTON. In other words, the Supreme Court of Alabama declared the same view that the Senator from Wisconsin now announces.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is correct; and the only reason why I called attention to it was this: In order to be perfectly fair, and that the Senate might know, I myself called attention to the fact that the Supreme Court of Alabama had so held, and called attention to the fact that the counsel for Mr. Heflin insisted that that holding did not apply because fraud was charged in this case; and I went on to say that notwithstanding they took that view, the committee did not agree with them.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the Senator from Delaware is entitled to an apology from me. I misunderstood him. I thought he said that the Supreme Court of the State of Alabama had declared that provision of the statute to be mandatory and not directory. My own thought was, upon a study of the question generally, that the provision was directory and not mandatory.

Now, I want to point out how quite immaterial it was, that it made no difference whether the ballots were numbered in ink or in lead pencil. I know it is contended that if the ballots were numbered in ink they would not be so readily subjected to the erasure of the number, but the number has to do only with the number on the poll list, as I understand—not the registry list, but the poll list. As I understand the election laws of Alabama, the voter who casts a ballot bears the same number as does his ballot. If anyone desired to manipulate that vote, it would be wholly unnecessary to erase the number. The practical and easy manner of manipulation would be to substitute another ballot, marked as the person who was engaging in such fraudulent practices desired to mark it, and that could be done whether the number was in ink or in lead pencil. But we can not unseat Members of the Senate, or deny them the right to represent their States, on such narrow technicalities. I just want to point out how ridiculous the situation appears, at least to me.

In the primary election in the State of Alabama the ballots may be numbered in ink, lead pencil, chalk, charcoal, or any other substance that will make a mark. In other words, there is no provision, respecting the primary ballots, that ballots shall be numbered by any specific method. They shall be numbered, of course. All of us have attended elections. We all know that it is quite the usual thing for election officers to carry lead pencils and not fountain pens. It is quite the usual thing and it is the universal practice to have lead pencils in the election booth with which the electors may mark the ballots. The lead pencil is the convenient instrument in and about election precincts.

In most years and in most elections in the State of Alabama the primary election was the important election. That was the election in which election officers were trained respecting the general conduct of the election. That was the election in which the election officers no doubt accustomed themselves to the use of lead pencils in numbering the ballots.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in this report it is distinctly stated:

> The facts so far disclosed would not justify the committee in refusing to count these ballots for the reason that they had not been properly numbered.

So that I entirely agree with the Senator with respect to the point to which he is now addressing himself.

Mr. BLAINE. I appreciate that the Senator from Delaware has been very fair in making statements respecting some of these irregularities; but I was leading up to another proposition, because it has been expressed on the Senate floor. The attempt has been made to multiply the violations of law in the State of Alabama, running into literally millions of violations, and I was pointing out this situation to show how utterly ridiculous it is to impute to the election in Alabama mounting violations of law.

I call attention to the report from which I have been reading—and this is no criticism whatever of the Senator from Delaware. He points out that there were 128,856 ballots not numbered in ink, and that there were 58,817 ballots not numbered at all. Therefore, according to some mathematicians, it is concluded that there were 187,673 violations of law.

I do not perceive those to be violations of law at all. They are quite immaterial irregularities. But carrying my thought along just another step, by the same report it is shown that there were 5,754 inspectors at the polls who violated the law, that is, I assume, inspectors at the voting places who did not mark the ballots in ink. To show how ridiculous it is to impute general violation of the law or willful violation of the law to the people of Alabama, how ridiculous it is to impute any unfitness to Senator Bankhead, based on these charges, just let us take a lead pencil and pad and multiply 187,673 ballots, the number not numbered in ink or not numbered at all, by the number of officers whose duty it was to conduct the elections, namely, 5,754, and by that mathematical calculation we find that there were over a million violations of law in Alabama—a terrible state. That simply pictures the situation as I see it, and as I believe it will generally be considered by those who have given the matter some thought.

Let us develop this a little further. In the same report from which I quoted it is shown that out of a total of 2,043 boxes, in 1,543 the ballots were found folded instead of rolled and sealed, and in 576 boxes they were found loose, both of these irregularities frequently occurring in the same box. There were but 19 boxes where the ballots were properly rolled and sealed.

There is shown a general practice of irregularities and omissions. Many of them are explained. But can anyone say that because ballots were not rolled and a seal placed upon the roll that that in any way imputes fraud in that election, or imputes any unfitness to Mr. Bankhead? Is there anything in that irregularity any more than happens at every election everywhere throughout the United States?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator from Wisconsin realizes, does he not, that the statute provides that after the ballots are counted they shall be rolled and sealed, and those which have been rejected shall be rolled and sealed, and both classes placed in the box and the box itself sealed, and all of it retained for the period of six months? Does the Senator think that is an unimportant part of the statute of any State? Does he not believe that was for the purpose of preventing fraud in elections, and does he not believe that when he finds those conditions absent, it indicates that there was fraud at the election?

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator asks a good many questions in one. I will try to answer them if I can remember all the questions.

That number of irregularities in an election means nothing unless there is some evidence which would connect the election officer in a conspiracy with the candidate, or his friends, with his knowledge and his connivance, engaging in that sort of practice in order to cover up their fraud. In the absence of any proof of fraud of course the irregularities, as I have said, become inconsequential and wholly immaterial.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does not the Senator think that it demands an explanation, and an explanation from the officers who violated that particular law? Can it just be brushed aside by the candidate and brushed aside by the Senate, and called an unimportant irregularity? Is that the Senator's contention?

Mr. BLAINE. No; that is not the Senator's contention. My contention is that I have no jurisdiction to punish the election officers of the State of Alabama, nor is it within my province to criticize the election officers of the State of Alabama. Perhaps they functioned carelessly, made many mistakes, there were many omissions; but are we to charge those omissions to a candidate for office? If so, what candidate? Are we to charge it to the candidates for the legislature in Alabama, to the candidates for county offices, to the candidates for membership in the house of representatives of the State, or candidates for other State offices? That is not within our power, nor is it within our province. There is no charge that Senator Bankhead, or that those supporting him with his knowledge, had anything to do with those omissions and irregularities.

The fact is that the omissions and irregularities were so general that they wipe out all suggestion or possibility of a conspiracy. That is the fact of the matter. There is no candidate, in my opinion, in Alabama or elsewhere, who could organize almost all of the election officers of a State, and induce them to commit such irregularities and omissions, without there being some men, or at least one man, who knew about them, and who would be willing to testify before the committee. Yet I know of no testimony, either before the Nye committee or the Hastings committee, that there was any conspiracy, or even an intimation of a conspiracy, that election officers were to commit these irregularities and omissions for the purpose of electing Mr. Bankhead to the Senate.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. Do I understand the Senator to contend that it is possible for a thing to be so good that it purifies itself and therefore becomes a thing that we ought to overlook? In other words, if it is half bad, then we ought to investigate it and declare it null and void, but if it is so terrible that you can not find any of the law lived up to at all we ought to overlook it and say that we have nothing to do with it?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I do not come to the same conclusions the Senator reaches. I do not think it was so terrible. I do not think it was terrible for election inspectors to number ballots in lead pencil instead of ink. I think it was the ordinary, usual thing that election officers would do. They had been accustomed to doing that very thing in the primary. Therefore that custom followed them into the election. There is nothing horrible or terrible about that at all. It is the most innocent act on the part of men who are not specially trained respecting the conduct of elections, but who know how to conduct elections; and it makes little difference, in their minds or in my mind, whether there is an immaterial irregularity or not.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, why does the Senator emphasize this question of numbering the ballots, when the committee distinctly stated that if that was the only thing, it would have no effect upon it? But why would he not please explain these irregularities, which, it seems to me, are important; namely, the failure to roll these ballots and to seal them, and to put them into these boxes, and then, when you go and make the investigation, find half of the boxes with the seals broken and the ballots not sealed on the inside? Those are the important, essential things in this case. Those are the things which the law intended should be placed there as barriers to prevent fraud, and those are the provisions which have been violated in Alabama. Those are the things which impressed me, not what the Senator from Alabama spent two hours and a half trying to explain to the Senate.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. We deny that there is any such evidence as the Senator stated. It is not in the record. The boxes, if opened, were shown to have been opened under the authority of law, except as to those broken open by the committee. In addition to that, we deny that the Senator has heretofore placed no great emphasis on the pencil proposition, because on page 8 of his report it is shown that he cited the fact that each one of the inspectors had violated the law a number of times. With reference to the rolling and sealing, which he is now emphasizing, I called the attention of the Senate the other day to the fact that Mr. Bankhead went to the committee and secured a list of those they thought were the most suspicious, and there are affidavits in the record that those votes were properly counted. There is a letter in the record addressed to the Senator from Delaware, from Mr. Bankhead, stating that if there were any more questions about the unrolled or unfolded ballots, he would be glad to get evidence with reference to that matter.

I desired to make this statement, because I did not want the remarks of the Senator from Delaware on this floor to go unchallenged.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, the difference between the Senator and myself is that the Senator from Alabama is not as familiar with this case as I am. He is talking about something that is not even mentioned in this report as a thing that ought to be considered by the Senate. However, I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Wisconsin. I shall answer the Senator from Alabama in my own time.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, reading from the preliminary report of the Senator from Delaware, I was endeavoring to enumerate these fabulous amounts represented as violations of law in Alabama. We have disposed of over a million of them, respecting the numbering the ballots by lead pencil instead of ink. Let us see about these boxes.

The report of the Senator from Alabama also states that the boxes found not sealed numbered 1,618. The Senator made this statement:

> I thought in the first instance that the breaking of the seals of these boxes was of great importance, and that if a box was found with the seal broken that the burden would be upon the sheriff who had the custody of the box to explain why the seal had been broken, but since the last meeting of the committee I have had some correspondence with Mr. Bankhead, which to my mind has largely destroyed the importance of ascertaining why a particular seal on a ballot box was broken.

That seems to be conclusive on that proposition. There was some evidence produced, as I understand, to explain the breaking of the seals. There was no evidence produced that there was any fraud perpetrated, no evidence that there was any conspiracy between Mr. Bankhead or those closely associated with him and the sheriffs, as I understand the sheriffs to have been the officers who had control or possession of the ballots.

Take the total number of violations, as I have pointed out, and add them to the violations to which I have just referred and to which the Senator from Delaware addressed himself a moment ago, and all that terribleness is dissipated. What is there left after we subtract the irregularities relating to the numbering of the ballots and the irregularities relating to the ballot boxes? What is there left even to raise a suspicion against the election officers of the State of Alabama? There is practically nothing left.

But the point I desire to emphasize is that there is no claim and there is no contention supported by evidence that Mr. Bankhead and those associated with him in the campaign in any manner promoted any irregularities or any so-called violations of the law, no inference that they had their hands in the innumerable so-called violations running into the hundreds of thousands. If there was any fraud whatever, there is no evidence that it at all in any manner attaches to Mr. Bankhead.

Let me say, Mr. President, that there is no evidence of fraud. This case has been investigated. It has been debated. There was a special committee on campaign expenditures for 1930 headed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] which conducted an investigation. An investigation has been carried on by the standing Committee on Privileges and Elections. I was unable to find a single scintilla of evidence of any corruption or any excessive use of money or any fraudulent practices upon the part of the candidate or his friends and associates. All of those charges of fraud grew out of the irregularities and omissions of election officers. No responsibility attaches to Mr. Bankhead in that respect. I say that after going through the report and going through the briefs of counsel and listening to their arguments. If there is, then I would like to have some Member of this body point out the error of my conclusion.

Mr. President, I appreciate, as I said at the outset, that the Senate of the United States has the power to declare the seat of the Senator from Alabama vacant, but I think the Senate of the United States as well has a sense of responsibility, and it will consider in all these election contests some of the legal fundamentals which govern elections generally. I point out a case in the State of Nebraska, volume 37, page 314, State ex rel. Crawford against Norris—and by way of parentheses I want to suggest that it has no reference to "Grocer" Norris nor to the distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. This case has particular application to the question of irregularities on the part of election officials and the omissions in which they engage.

There are two reasons why the court disregards irregularities and omissions on the part of election officers. One reason is that the electors have the right to depend upon the validity of an election. They have a right to have their views expressed. Their views can be expressed only by the casting of a ballot. They have a right to have their ballots counted. The right is in the elector, and to set aside an election that is entirely free from corrupting influences, debauchery, excessive use of money, an election that is free from all the baneful influences of money and corruption, is not within the province of the United States Senate. In that kind of an election the people of a State have the right to have their ballots counted and the results which flow from their exercise of the ballot recognized. That is one reason why the courts disregard irregularities and omissions by election officers.

Then some courts have applied another reason and that reason is pointed out in the case to which I have just referred. I shall read the language:

> The fundamental object of all election laws is the freedom and purity of the ballot. It is to be observed that the voter has no control whatever over the publication of the names of candidates or the forms of the ballots. If for such defects in these particulars the ballot must be rejected, the door would be thrown open to fraud. To defeat the will of the people it would only be necessary to have (in this particular contest) the county clerks furnish the electors, or some of them, with tickets slightly variant from those prescribed by law.

I quote the language in that case for the purpose of pointing out that irregularities and omissions must be disregarded by the courts, else the door would at once be thrown open to the practice of fraud by election officers either through willfulness or improper motives. In the absence of such a rule they could commit enough irregularities to beat the party, if that was the design, or to beat the candidate if their design went no farther.

Mr. President, this contest coming to the Senate without the taint of fraud, without the taint of corruption, without the taint of excessive use of money, I could come to only one conclusion, and that was the conclusion reached by the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I do not concede it to be the duty or the province of the Senate to determine whether or not Alabama's primary election law should be revised or remodeled. That is not the question. If it were the question, this is not the forum for the determination of that question. So long as the laws of the State of Alabama, as I have pointed out, control its internal affairs respecting the election of a United States Senator, permitting the people of that State to exercise their constitutional rights and privileges as do the statutes, as I construe those statutes, then, Mr. President, it seems to me that we can not afford to disturb an election on grounds of the thinnest irregularities and omissions alleged to have been committed by the election officers. It seems to me that we must recognize the expression of the people of Alabama in this case.

The State of Alabama, therefore, having preserved for her people their rights and their privileges, for me to come to any other conclusion would be an exercise of extremest partisanship. As for myself, I bow my head and cringe my knee to no party whip. I recognize but one power, and that is the sovereign will of the people expressed through an uncorrupted election.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield in order that I may ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I understood the Senator to say just now that he bowed only to the will of the sovereign people. If I am correctly informed the Senator voted for the Democratic candidate for President in the last campaign in Wisconsin. Is that true?

Mr. BLAINE. I have no apologies to make for having voted in that way.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am merely asking the Senator if that is a fact?

Mr. BLAINE. I have no apologies to make for having voted for Mr. Smith. I think it was a terrible mistake that a majority voted for Mr. Hoover, and that is my personal feeling. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must admonish occupants of the galleries that they are here by the courtesy of the Senate and they must not infringe the rules of the body.

Mr. BLAINE. I might say it was a more terrible mistake than the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] has characterized the Alabama election to be.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am not quarreling with the Senator from Wisconsin for having voted as he chose. The Senator himself is a candidate this year to succeed himself in the Senate, I understand. What I am trying to lead up to is this: Suppose the Republican State central committee in Wisconsin should adopt the same kind of rule as was adopted in Alabama, and as a result of that rule should keep the Senator's name off the Republican ticket in the primary in Wisconsin, would the Senator then feel that the sovereign people of Wisconsin were having an opportunity to decide that question or would he think the party bosses of Wisconsin were deciding or undertaking to decide the question without giving the people of Wisconsin any chance whatever?

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Indiana need not have any worry about that. What the Senator from Indiana has described is not going to happen. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No, Mr. President; but that is exactly what happened in Alabama. That is the point I am making, and suppose it did happen in Wisconsin. Then my contention is that the sovereign people of Wisconsin would not have any voice in the matter at all, but only the party bosses.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, does the Senator from Indiana expect me to answer a hypothetical question as to what can not happen and is not going to happen? I decline to engage in that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But that did happen in Alabama. That is why some of us are claiming that the primary in Alabama was illegal, in that, acting wholly illegally, one set of rules were prescribed for the Democratic voters of Alabama and another set of rules for the candidates on the Democratic ticket in Alabama, raising the same question I have just undertaken to present to the Senator from Wisconsin.

We feel the sovereign people of Alabama, so far as the Democratic Party is concerned there—and that is, of course, overwhelmingly the majority party—never had any voice in the matter. That is precisely what we object to, and why we think the primary there was illegal; and I am saying, if, under the same set of circumstances, the State organization of the Republican Party of Wisconsin should attempt to do what the State organization of the Democratic Party in Alabama did as Democrats, then the Senator himself would be prevented from having his name placed upon the Republican ticket of Wisconsin, no matter what the sovereign people might thing about it or how they might feel about it. It was never left to the people in Alabama, in the slightest degree, but some 50 men—the bosses of the State committee—undertaking or assuming to speak for the sovereign people, decided the question for the people without giving the people an opportunity to express themselves. That is the point I am making.

Mr. BLAINE. I know how great the anxiety of the Senator from Indiana is respecting the Senator from Wisconsin. I appreciate that anxiety; in fact, I deeply appreciate it; but the trouble with the Senator from Indiana is that he did not give the Senator from Wisconsin the honor of being present in the Senate when the Senator from Wisconsin discussed the very question that the Senator from Indiana has now raised. May I call attention briefly to the fact that the statutes of Alabama prescribe the powers and designate the organization that determines the qualifications of candidates for public office? The statutes of the State of Alabama define the qualifications of electors in a primary. I have pointed out specifically the statutes and made my argument along the theory that I adopted in this contest. While I would be very glad to repeat the argument, I think it is wholly unnecessary, and the Senator from Indiana will be privileged to read in the RECORD in the morning my analysis of the Alabama situation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I understand that ex-Senator Heflin, the contestant in this case, desires to be given the privilege of addressing the Senate for not exceeding two hours. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] brought this matter to the attention of the Senate on Friday of last week and had contemplated making a motion for this privilege to be extended to ex-Senator Heflin on a day prior to the conclusion of the consideration of the case. The Senator from Louisiana, however, is not present to-day, and in the interest of——

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum before he makes his request?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Florida yielding for that purpose, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Costigan	Howell	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Couzens	Johnson	Schall
Bailey	Cutting	Jones	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dale	Kean	Shipstead
Barkley	Dickinson	Kendrick	Shortridge
Bingham	Dill	La Follette	Smoot
Black	Fess	Lewis	Steiwer
Blaine	Fletcher	Logan	Stephens
Borah	Frazier	McGill	Thomas, Idaho
Bratton	George	McKellar	Thomas, Okla.
Brookhart	Glass	McNary	Townsend
Broussard	Goldsborough	Metcalf	Trammell
Bulkley	Gore	Moses	Tydings
Byrnes	Hale	Norbeck	Vandenberg
Capper	Hastings	Norris	Walcott
Caraway	Hatfield	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Carey	Hawes	Oddie	Watson
Connally	Hayden	Reed	White
Copeland	Hebert	Robinson, Ark.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, as I had stated prior to the calling of the quorum, it is my understanding that on Friday of last week—I was absent at the time, however—the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] asked unanimous consent that former Senator Heflin, the contestant in the pending case, be allowed to address the Senate for a period of not exceeding two hours. It is my understanding that he contemplated making a motion to that effect had he been present to-day. He, I am informed, is unavoidably absent from the Senate to-day.

I have looked up the precedents, and I find that this privilege has been extended to contestants in a number of cases in the past where it was desired, and in the Precedents of the United States Senate, on page 522, I find cited only cases where that privilege was granted. I have found no instance where the privilege has been refused or rejected.

Without intending in any way to have it express my views in regard to the final outcome of this contest, or as to who should be seated, I feel that in view of the precedents, and the desire of the contestant to address the Senate for not exceeding two hours, there could be nothing amiss in extending to him this privilege.

Therefore, Mr. President, I move that the contestant, former Senator J. Thomas Heflin, be permitted to address the Senate for not exceeding two hours in the pending contest.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it will be recalled that on another day a request for unanimous consent to permit Mr. Heflin to address the Senate was submitted and that objection was made. Under the circumstances I do not believe this motion should be granted. I do not believe it is in order under the rules of the Senate.

As stated by the Senator from Florida, there have been instances in which the Senate by motion has extended the privilege to speak in a contestant's own case. In some of those cases the contestant possessed a certificate of election or of appointment. In any event it is a questionable procedure.

The contestant in this case enjoyed unlimited hearing before the committee. The resolution reported is that the sitting Member is entitled to his seat. There is not any report or recommendation, there is not any Senator who has contended or suggested, that Mr. Heflin is entitled to that seat.

If the proposition were presented in the alternative, if the contention of those who oppose Mr. Bankhead retaining his seat were that Mr. Heflin was elected, I should not object to his participation in this debate; but it becomes a question in which he is only collaterally interested. If the resolution reported by the committee should prevail, it would result merely in vacating the seat of the sitting Member from Alabama. It could not under any circumstances result in seating former Senator Heflin.

The sitting Member, Mr. Bankhead, has not appealed to individual Members. He has not appealed to the Senate. He has been content to permit this case to be determined as a quasi judicial question. Mr. Bankhead has manifested commendable modesty. He has not obtruded himself upon his friends as a reason they should respond to his desires in connection with this contest.

Believing that under the rules of the Senate no one but a Senator is entitled as a matter of law to speak to the Senate, and that in order to permit another to address the Senate the rules must be suspended, I make the point of order on the motion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, what I shall say probably will be in no sense technical, and perhaps will not be directed immediately to the point raised by the Senator from Arkansas on the point of order, which, of course, is a technical objection.

Since I have been a Member of the Senate I have never known in a contest case anyone who was not a Member of the Senate to be allowed to address the Senate on the controversy, except in the case of Mr. Vare. By unanimous consent he was permitted to speak. I thought at the time it was a bad precedent. It is true that I had the right to object, and did not; but the reason why I did not object was because I had been quite active in the matter—I was the author of the resolution that excluded him and I did not feel that I ought to put myself in the attitude of making an objection.

In this case I feel perfectly free to speak my real sentiments, because I expect to vote against the seating of Senator Bankhead when the vote comes. I expect to have something to say about it before the vote is reached; so I am under no embarrassment in saying just a few words against this proposal and the establishment of a precedent which, to my mind, is a dangerous step for the Senate to take.

We have committees of the Senate for the express purpose of hearing people who are not Members of the Senate deliver to the Senate, through the committees, arguments and addresses of all kinds. Anybody can see at a glance that unless we had some rule of that kind, we would spend years here listening to the arguments of gentlemen from all over the United States on every contested question coming before us. That is true of every legislative body; so it seems to me that it is a dangerous thing to establish a precedent of this kind.

The only question involved here is whether Senator Bankhead shall retain the seat he now occupies or whether a vacancy shall be declared. I see no reason why former Senator Heflin should be allowed to speak to the Senate, any more than why we should invite his attorneys or the attorneys on the other side of the matter to come here and address the Senate.

It is not because I would not expect them to make arguments probably better than any that have been made that I take this position. That is not the point at all. I have no doubt but that former Senator Heflin and many others who are not Members of the Senate could make very able and perhaps very convincing arguments from their viewpoints. If, however, we are going to admit outsiders—persons who are not Members of the Senate now—to address us on this subject, why do we confine it to one man, able though he may be, and all that? Why should not the doors be thrown wide open, and why should we not permit outsiders in general to come in here and argue this question?

If the Senate wants to do that, that is one thing; but that is what we are doing if we agree to this motion, as I look at it.

It seems to me that as a matter of law this motion, to be good, would have to lie over for one day unless it were taken up by unanimous consent, and would have to be passed by a two-thirds vote. The effect of agreeing to the motion would be to say that we must decide that gentlemen who are not Members of the Senate may address the Senate on this subject. It goes much farther than the action in the Vare case, because Mr. Vare was contending that he was entitled to the seat.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, Mr. Vare also held a certificate of election from the governor of his State.

Mr. NORRIS. He did; he had a certificate of election. He was permitted to speak by unanimous consent. To be perfectly fair, I think we ought to say that while Mr. Vare did have a certificate of election from the governor of his State, he was not admitted to the Senate; he was not a Member of the Senate. The resolution which was proposed was offered when he presented himself to be sworn in, although it is true that he had a certificate of election from the Governor of Pennsylvania.

I think Senators ought to vote on this question with an eye to the future, beyond what this particular motion means. If it were passed, and Senator Heflin were allowed to speak, and that would end it all, that would be one thing; but we are asked to take a step which, it seems to me, would come home to plague us, and if we were consistent we would have to permit people who admittedly were non-Members of the Senate to come before the Senate and address us on various questions which come before us.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. Adverting to a statement made by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] as to the nature of the motion now under consideration, what more right has former Senator Heflin to speak on this question than any other citizen of Alabama who might be interested in having the seat declared vacant and might desire to become a candidate before the people for the Senate would have?

Mr. NORRIS. As far as I can see, he has no more right than any other citizen would have.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I feel that this is a motion incident to the consideration of the issues involved, and that it is not out of order.

What has been said in regard to some of the questions which have been before the Senate in the past is largely correct, but in making this motion I base it upon the precedent of the Senate laid down in the Yulee case, coming up from Florida in 1852, also a later case in 1892, and several other similar incidents.

In 1852 Stephen R. Mallory, of Florida, came to the Senate holding a certificate of election. Yulee came here and contested his right to the seat. The Committee on Privileges and Elections reported to the Senate and recommended the seating of Mallory. Thereupon Yulee asked for the privilege, as the contestant, of addressing the Senate. He was given that privilege, so the precedent states. He did not hold a certificate of election; he never claimed that he held a certificate of election. He was a party in the contest solely because he was the contestant.

I draw a distinction between a contestant in an election case and some individual entirely outside having nothing to do with it, just as I would draw a distinction in a litigated case before a court, where the plaintiff and the defendant have certain rights and certain privileges. Although the verdict may be against the defendant, he would have certain rights, within the discretion of the court, which some outsider would not have. I do not think there is any analogy between the privilege which may be extended to a contestant and the privilege which may be extended to some person entirely outside who has nothing to do with the contest. This Senate has repeatedly allowed a contestant to appear and address the Senate, but never an outsider.

Heretofore, as far as the records disclose, the unbroken precedent has been, where a contestant desired it, to allow him to address the Senate—not the person holding the certificate of election, as was true in the Vare case and in the Smith case. Of course, we have to resort merely to technical distinctions to hold that they had some right to address the Senate which a contestant would not have. However, in those cases the resolutions were amended after they were reported to the Senate. An amendment in one instance was proposed by the Senator from Missouri, Mr. Reed, I think in the Smith case, to give Smith the privilege of appearing before the Senate, although the Senate had denied him a seat, and refused him the right to be admitted to the Senate upon his certificate of election. A resolution was adopted allowing him to come and defend himself, and represent himself upon the floor of the Senate. I think in the other instance a motion was made to amend the resolution so as to accord that privilege to Mr. Vare, and that motion was offered by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and was agreed to in that instance.

If we are to discriminate between a person holding a certificate of election and a person not holding a certificate, then the practice in regard to cases where there is a contest, so far as the privilege heretofore extended to a contestant is concerned, has invariably been that the contestant was permitted to address the Senate.

I desire to have placed in the RECORD an extract from the Precedents of the United States Senate appearing on page 522, under subdivision 2, Contestant Permitted to Explain at Bar.

This specifically cites two different cases. Then I find this in a note:

Many instances are in the Journal where the same privilege was granted.

I would like to have those who are opposing this motion to cite a single instance where such a request has been refused.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think my colleague ought to read those precedents. They are brief extracts.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I will read them. I just want to say, before doing that, that the precedents to which I have referred have not risen heretofore to plague anybody. The Florida precedent was set more than a half century ago, and in the 15 years I have been here I have heard of but one person addressing the Senate in connection with a contest, and that was Senator Vare, who was extended that privilege without, as I recall, a single objection. There has been no abuse, and it has not especially annoyed the Senate, and it has not plagued anybody. It has not opened the door to citizens outside who were not directly interested in a contest being invited to speak before the Senate. I know of no instance of that character. May I again repeat, I have made the motion based upon the precedent, feeling that there is no reason why we should reverse the precedent in this particular case. The former custom should stand. Why should we reverse the precedent in this particular case?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Senator Vare claimed the seat himself, did he not?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly he claimed it.

Mr. NORRIS. Senator Heflin does not claim this seat, does he?

Mr. TRAMMELL. In his contest he claims the right to be seated. The committee has recommended that Senator Bankhead be seated, and that question is now before the Senate for consideration, and the Senate has not acted on the committee's report. The question of whom the committee recommends to be seated or not seated is not involved at all in connection with the motion to allow a person the privilege of being heard. There are entirely two different questions involved.

Mr. NORRIS. The question involved is whether or not Senator Bankhead shall retain the seat he now occupies. If it is decided that he shall not, there will be a vacancy. That would not put Senator Heflin in.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I am not entering into the merits of the case. As I stated in the outset, I do not want my attitude in regard to the final vote on the merits of the case to be assumed by the motion I have made. My motion is not indicative of how I will vote on the final outcome at all. I do not wish it so understood. But answering the question of the Senator, the decison of the committee is not the decision of the Senate, unless the Senate sees proper to adopt that decision. If the Senate sees proper to amend the resolution which has been introduced, and provide that former Senator Heflin shall be seated as a Member of the Senate, the Senate has the right to do so; or it may simply reject entirely the resolution providing that Senator Bankhead be seated and formulate and adopt altogether a different resolution. The matter is undisposed of up to the present time as to the final action of the Senate on the main question.

I do not desire to prolong the discussion at all, but I will read, as suggested by my colleague, the precedents laid down in the Precedents of the United States Senate; and as far as I have been able to ascertain, this is the only expression upon the subject of the attitude of the Senate heretofore in cases of similar character. I read from page 522:

[32d Cong., 1st sess.; Journal, pp. 6, 622, 625, 648, 649, 650 (December 1, 1851, August 21, 23, 27, 1852)]

At the opening of this Congress, December 1, 1851, the credentials of Stephen R. Mallory, of Florida, were read, and Mr. Mallory took the oath prescribed by law and took his seat in the Senate Mr. D. L. Yulee contested his seat. The select committee having the case in charge reported (August 21, 1852) that Mr. Mallory was duly elected and entitled to the seat; and on August 27, the Senate, by a vote of 23 to 21, agreed to consider this report. The same day the Senate refused to grant leave to Mr. Yulee "to be heard in person at the bar of the Senate"; yeas 17, nays 29; but, when the resolution was amended, granting the contestant the leave to be heard "for two hours," it was agreed to by a vote of yeas 31, nays 21. Mr. Yulee then appeared at the bar of the Senate and was heard. The resolution reported by the select committee declaring Mr. Mallory duly elected was agreed to; yeas 41, nays 0.

[52d Cong., 1st sess.; Journal, pp. 125, 127, 130 (February 25, 26, 29, 1892)]

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections on the contested seat in the Senate from the State of Idaho. Mr. William H. Claggett, the contestant, was given permission to occupy the floor and was given the right to speak not exceeding two hours. The next day the limitation as to the time allowed the contestant, William H. Claggett, was withdrawn. Mr. Claggett occupied the floor part of two days in his own defense. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 1430–1432, 1445–1448, 1473, 1486, 1533–1544.)

(Many instances are in the Journal where the same privilege was granted.)

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Does the precedent disclose the relationship of Mr. Claggett to the seat? My recollection is that Mr. Dubois and Mr. Claggett both held certificates of election from the legislature.

Mr. TRAMMELL. It does not disclose that information.

Mr. BORAH. I think it will be found that there was an election in the first instance as a result of which Mr. Dubois was given a certificate of election. Mr. Claggett claimed it was an illegal election. The legislature took up the matter again and elected Mr. Claggett, and my recollection is that both Mr. Dubois and Mr. Claggett held certificates of election from the secretary of state.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The precedents do not disclose that information. Of course, the precedent from which I read specifically states that Mr. Mallory held the certificate of election. A footnote to this case reads:

Many instances are in the Journal where the same privilege was granted.

I would not have presented the motion had it not been for the fact that the only source of information I have is the Precedents of the Senate, and under which it seems that it had been uniformly the custom to extend this privilege to the contestants, and a contestant who did not hold a certificate of election. I see no reason why it should be withheld in this instance, the former Senator from Alabama, Mr. Heflin, having expressed a desire to be given this privilege and his request having been brought to the attention of the Senate, as I previously stated, by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] during last week.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Has the Senator been able to look into the RECORD or the Journal, and is he able to tell us the other precedents?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have not gone into the precedents other than as cited in the volume of precedents which we use here as our guide for the procedure of the Senate.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have heard that there are indeed seven such precedents.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I understand there are seven in number. I have not looked up the others. Within that number may be included the instance where the party accorded the privilege was holding the certificate of election, but wherever the question has arisen, and the certificate of election did not exist, the privilege has in every case reported been extended. I can not foresee where any harm can be done, and I do not see why the Senate should reverse the precedents. In the Yulee case they gave Mr. Yulee the privilege of the floor, but the final outcome was not changed, because in that instance the vote was overwhelmingly in favor of Mallory. But where the contestant desires the privilege, it does seem to me there is no reason why we should reverse the precedent, and accordingly I made the motion and hope it will be adopted. We may remember that the Senate is the tribunal of last resort and renders the final decision. The work and recommendation of the committee do not conclude the case. Only the action of the Senate is final.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, on Friday last the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] asked unanimous consent that former Senator Heflin might be permitted to address the Senate for two hours. At that time I objected to the unanimous-consent request. Since that time and at this time I have no reason to change my views. I still think it is a privilege which should not be accorded to the former Senator. I persist in the thought that the request is an unusual one and should not be accorded to former Senator Heflin or any former Senator or to anyone not a Member of this body.

I have not had the time to read the precedent cited by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], but it seems to me that the Idaho case is not at all in point. It is true from what has been said of the Vare case that it is not in point. Mr. Vare came to the Senate with credentials from the governor which entitled him to a seat if objection was not made.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I point out also to the Senator from Oregon that the issue in the Vare case, raised when the certificate of election was presented, was one affecting the integrity of the Senator elect or one related to the question of personal corruption. Possibly that statement might be open to misconstruction. What I intend to convey, if I did not do so, is that the certificate of election which Mr. Vare held and presented was questioned because of the alleged participation by Mr. Vare in corrupt practices encompassing his election in the primary and in the general election.

Mr. McNARY. I am willing to accord all the substance that has been given by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to these precedents, but I am sure of one thing, that a bad precedent never makes a good practice. I do not care how many precedents heretofore established might be cited; in my humble opinion it is an unusual request and one that should be denied. Former Senator Heflin is not a party to these proceedings. I can not see how he would be interested in the title to the seat. As has been so well stated by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], if the seat should be denied the present occupant thereof, in no sense could it go other than by appointment to former Senator Heflin. Therefore the former Senator is only occupying the position of a bystander. He may have an ambition to succeed to this seat, but he has no legal or moral right to it, and to permit the former Senator to come here and make a statement in his own behalf is, in my opinion, quite on a par with permitting the attorney for Mr. Heflin to come here or permitting anyone from the outside to do so.

I have no personal feeling in the matter other than the orderly procedure which should control the conduct of the business of the Senate. For the reasons I have attempted briefly to enumerate, I shall oppose the motion made by the Senator from Florida. Beyond that I am attracted by the attitude assumed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Democratic leader, in questioning that this motion might be carried by a majority vote. Without a doubt, there are certain rules or practices that have grown into rules which permit only Members to address this body and any attempt to collide with or overthrow this rule or practice must necessarily be done by a two-thirds vote. In that position of the Senator from Arkansas I concur and submit the matter to the Presiding Officer.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, the question has been discussed so fully and so ably that perhaps I can do no more than state my position with respect to it.

First, I concur heartily in the point of order raised by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that the motion suspends the rule. It is an innovation of the rules. It creates a different situation from that which ordinarily obtains in the Senate under the rules.

Mr. President, a fair interpretation of the full scope of the rules, their purpose, their intent, their object, would lead anyone to the conclusion that under the rules only a Senator can occupy the floor and address this body. Therefore the motion to extend the right to another, to an outsider, of itself constitutes a suspension pro tanto or an innovation of the rules of the Senate.

Would it be contended, under any express rule of the Senate or by any fair interpretation of the rules considered singly or collectively or by necessary implication or by fair implication or by tenable implication, it was intended by the Senate in making such rules that an outsider should occupy the floor? No. But now it is proposed to permit an outsider to occupy the floor and address the Senate.

Therefore, I concur heartily in the point of order and the view expressed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] that the motion operates to suspend the rules of the Senate. It transcends the spirit of the rules, if not their letter. Accordingly, I think it would require a two-thirds vote to adopt a motion of this kind.

In addition to that, and addressing myself to the merits of the motion, regardless of the precedents—and I think some of them can be distinguished from this case—I doubt the wisdom of adopting the proposed procedure. If it is adopted now, it must be followed in every contest case that comes hereafter where the contestant desires to address the Senate, whether he be a former Senator or an unsuccessful contestant who has never occupied the floor of the Senate. No distinction can be made between a contestant who is also a former member of the body and a contestant who has never served in the body. One should have no right over the other and so, if we take the step now, consistency will require that we follow it hereafter whenever a contestant asks the privilege of the floor.

Mr. President, no one wants to deprive a contestant of his opportunity to be heard. In this connection I close by saying that the contestant in this case has been given every opportunity to be heard. This goes to the merits of the motion and the individual conscience of each Member of the body.

Former Senator Heflin's counsel and the former Senator himself have addressed the subcommittee at great length. His attorneys addressed the full committee at great length. Indeed, on the argument of the case only 10 days ago, or thereabouts, counsel for the contestant addressed the full Committee on Privileges and Elections about five hours—until they completed their argument. It is true that I did not favor giving them that much time. Frankly, I think lawyers who argue a case five hours hurt their cause. It is too much argument. I favored reducing the time, but the committee gave counsel for the contestant five hours, and they argued until they had finished and ceased voluntarily. All of the argument is printed in the record of the hearings and subject to be read by any Member of this body.

So, Mr. President, a denial of this motion will not operate to proscribe the contestant in the presentation of his contentions in the case. Both upon the question of orderly procedure in the Senate and sound precedent to obtain in the future the motion should be denied. Transcending that consideration and approaching it from the standpoint of justice and equity and right toward the contestant, I think his rights will not have been injured and he will not have been denied an opportunity to present his argument in full by a denial of the motion. Accordingly I shall vote against the motion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, was the Chair about to rule on the point of order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was about to make a statement, but will be glad to hear from the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is a little unpleasant to discuss the matter. The contestant has been a Member of this body. But it seems to me that we are called upon to decide it upon its merits.

I think in all probability the precedent cited about the Senators from Florida is in line, but I think it an unwise precedent.

Mr. BRATTON. Will the Senator from Idaho yield further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. I intended to call attention to one other phase of the matter. I am sure the Senator from Idaho will agree that the precedent does not disclose that the parliamentary question was ever raised. Apparently it is now raised for the first time. I think the Senator and I will agree as to that.

Mr. BORAH. That is probably true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is correct, if the Senator from Idaho will pardon me.

Mr. BORAH. The precedent cited in the Florida contest seems to me to be in point, but, to repeat, I do not think it is a wise precedent. I am quite sure that the precedent cited from Idaho, from my viewpoint at least, is not in line. I am quite sure that the precedent as to Mr. Vare is not in line. Both those men appeared here with certificates of election, valid upon their face, entitling them to a seat in this body. My own view is that such a certificate entitled them to a seat until the matter was determined, and certainly placed the individual asking for an opportunity to be heard in a different position than that of an individual who has no call upon the seat which is in controversy.

In going through the record in this case, which some of us have done pretty thoroughly, I did not find any state of facts which would under any circumstances permit ex-Senator Heflin to have this seat in case it should be declared vacant so far as Mr. Bankhead is concerned. There would have to be an appointment or there would have to be another election in order to determine who is entitled to the vacated seat. Mr. Heflin appears, therefore, as any person who might have an interest in a question before this body might appear and ask to be heard. The fact that the controversy is over a seat in this body does not change the principle; he is simply interested in the subject; he holds no title to the seat, even should it be declared vacant. If we admit him to the floor and to address us, we are establishing the precedent that anyone vitally interested in a question might justly invoke.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I shall yield to the Senator in just a moment. So Mr. Heflin stands in the same relationship to this contest as would his attorney or anyone in Alabama who might be deeply interested in the subject—indeed, anyone who might be concerned as to the result of this controversy. I can see no different relationship between them and that which any deeply interested person might have. Now I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Will the Senator permit me to remark that it was argued, with great earnestness, that Mr. Bankhead never was legally a candidate for the Senate; that his name was not legally on the ballot when the general election took place? It was further argued, with great earnestness, by a very able advocate that the votes cast for Mr. Bankhead were to be regarded as null and void. It was further argued that Mr. Heflin was legally nominated; that his name was legally on the ballot; that the ballots cast for him were legal; and, thus briefly recalling the argument, the conclusion was urged that Mr. Heflin was the duly elected Senator from the State of Alabama.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from California has stated what was argued, but what does the Senator think?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I answer with great frankness. I think that the nomination of Mr. Bankhead was illegal; that his name was illegally on the ballot. If that be so, and Mr. Heflin's name was legally on the ballot, the votes cast for him were legal and he was elected.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand that the Senator from California thinks, in case the seat shall be declared vacant, that Mr. Heflin is entitled to take the seat?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. My own individual opinion is that Mr. Heflin was duly elected Senator from the State of Alabama and, being so, should be admitted as the Senator from that State.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have read the arguments and the contention with reference to the right of Mr. Heflin to take the seat in case it should be declared that Mr. Bankhead is not entitled to it. I was proceeding upon the theory that that contention had been abandoned. For myself, I can find no justification in law for that contention. If Mr. Bankhead shall be declared not to be the Senator from Alabama, my opinion is that every other eligible candidate in the State of Alabama has the same right to this seat that Mr. Heflin would have.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Will the Senator pardon me further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If Mr. Heflin were the only legal candidate and received a certain number of votes, does it not follow that he received a majority or, in this instance, I think, the total legal vote cast for a legal candidate, in which event I am suggesting that he is the duly elected Senator from that State? Of course, if the Senator from Idaho will pardon me a little longer, that assumes the validity of the argument that Mr. Bankhead was not a legal candidate and that all the votes cast for him were utterly null and void.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho permit me to ask a question of the Senator from California?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I should like to ask the Senator from California, assuming the only legal candidate, as he contends Mr. Heflin was, should get only 1 per cent of the votes of the State of Alabama, does the Senator think the Senate would be justified in seating that candidate under any circumstances?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do, if he had the other qualifications, because I do not reach the conclusion that the election was utterly null and void. No State shall be deprived of its representation here in the Senate; indeed, it may not be under the Constitution, and if it be that the only legal candidate received 20 per cent of the votes cast, he is nevertheless, in my humble opinion, the duly elected, if he be otherwise qualified, Senator from that State.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have been proceeding upon the theory that Mr. Heflin was not entitled under any circumstances to this seat in this contest. I venture to say that whatever the result may be with reference to Mr. Bankhead that will also be the determination of the Senate. I do not think there is anything in the record which would justify any other conclusion. So, Mr. President, I regard this matter in the same light as if a person wholly disconnected with the contest were here asking for an opportunity to be heard. I do not know upon what theory we can admit Mr. Heflin to the floor, and not establish the precedent that anyone deeply interested in a controversy here in the Senate may not have the right to be heard, whether upon the question of a tariff on oil or a tariff on coal or a tariff on lumber. His relationship to the controversy is no different, in my judgment, than the relationship of an individual who may be deeply interested in any other controversy. Therefore, Mr. President, whatever the precedent may be, I do not think that it ought to be followed or made the settled rule of this body.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has examined the record of the two cases cited by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] and finds that the point of order was not raised in either of them. There is no rule of the Senate on the subject; and, therefore, the Chair submits to the Senate the question as to whether or not the motion of the Senator from Florida is in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in view of the ruling of the Chair, I prefer to have the vote come directly on the motion of the Senator from Florida, and I withdraw the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas withdraws his point of order. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I had not intended to participate in this discussion but was prompted to inquire of Senators touching their views and in brevity to express my own as to one phase of the problem. I agree fully with the thoughtful Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] that we should not be governed by precedents unless we be satisfied that they are wise precedents. The case which came up from Florida away back yonder in 1852, of course, is directly in point. I understand that there was a case that came from the State of Kansas in 1861, which is directly in point, where the contestant was permitted to address the Senate, no time limit being set, and that there are other cases aggregating, according to the memorandum before me, seven.

Mr. President, permit me to repeat what perhaps I said a few moments ago by way of answering questions propounded. It was argued before the committee that Mr. Bankhead—I will so refer to him for the moment—for reasons set forth was not a legal candidate of the Democratic Party as result of the alleged illegal primary held in the State of Alabama. It was argued by learned counsel, that his name was illegally on the ballot cast by the citizens at the general election following the primary. It was, of course, pursuing that line of argument, contended that all the votes cast for him at the general election were, in point of legal contemplation, null and void. Running in a sense parallel with that line of reasoning, it was argued that Mr. Heflin was a legal candidate, and that his name was legally placed on the ticket at the general election, and the conclusion was reached, that whereas all the votes cast for Mr. Bankhead were null and void, and whereas all the votes cast for Mr. Heflin were valid, that he, Mr. Heflin, was the legal choice of the people of that great and splendid State—was legally elected Senator. With great respect for other members of the committee, and with great deference to the learning of the Senate, I some time ago reached the conclusion that the line of reasoning of Mr. Heflin's counsel was sound and that his conclusion was correct.

I do not care to pursue the argument. I trouble the Senate for a moment merely to indicate my views. They may be erroneous; but I wish them to be understood by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. AUSTIN (when his name was called.) I have a pair for the day with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR], whose necessary absence I have previously announced to-day. Knowing that he would vote as I intend to vote, I desire to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. DICKINSON (when his name was called). On this question I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], who is absent. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HATFIELD (when his name was called.) I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON]. I am informed that if he were present he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HEBERT (when his name was called.) I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called.) I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. STEIWER (when his name was called.) On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], who is unavoidably detained from the Chamber. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho (when his name was called.) I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. VANDENBERG (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. COPELAND (when Mr. WAGNER's name was called). My colleague [Mr. WAGNER] is absent on official business. He is paired on this question with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. PATTERSON]. If my colleague were present and at liberty to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. He is absent from the city, and I am unable to secure a transfer. I therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. My colleague the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE] is absent in Massachusetts. If present, he would vote "nay." He has a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN].

Mr. GEORGE. Upon this matter I have a pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] has a general pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the following Senators are necessarily detained from the Senate on account of official business:

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HULL], and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON].

The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is detained from the Senate by illness. He has a general pair with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES].

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—33

Barkley	Fess	Metcalf	Smoot
Bingham	Fletcher	Moses	Thomas, Okla.
Brookhart	Goldsborough	Norbeck	Townsend
Capper	Gore	Nye	Trammell
Carey	Hale	Reed	Walcott
Connally	Hastings	Robinson, Ind.	White
Costigan	Johnson	Sheppard
Couzens	Kean	Shipstead
Dill	La Follette	Shortridge

NAYS—31

Ashurst	Bulkley	Hayden	McNary
Austin	Byrnes	Howell	Norris
Bailey	Caraway	Jones	Oddie
Black	Copeland	Kendrick	Robinson, Ark.
Blaine	Dale	Lewis	Stephens
Borah	Frazier	Logan	Tydings
Bratton	Glass	McGill	Walsh, Mass.
Broussard	Hawes	McKellar

NOT VOTING—31

Bankhead	Glenn	Morrison	Thomas, Idaho
Barbour	Harrison	Neely	Vandenberg

Coolidge	Hebert	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Cutting	Hull	Schall	Waterman
Davis	Keyes	Smith	Watson
Dickinson	King	Steiwer	Wheeler
George	Long	Swanson

So Mr. TRAMMELL's motion was agreed to.

RECESS

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 26, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, APRIL 25, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

For this brief moment, our Father, we would close the doors of our senses that we may be able to hear Thee within; to know the divine will, may this be our purpose. We wait on Thee, O God, but we have no terms to define Thy greatness. But stretch out Thy hand upon us, control our understanding, direct our spirits, and guide our wandering hearts. Do Thou inspire us with aspirations of soul, with lofty desires, and with gracious affections. Blessed God, make us bigger and better for the service to our country this day. Be Thou, Almighty God, with this Congress and guide it into the things that shall be for the stability of our times and for the welfare of our great people, and unto Thee be eternal praises. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, April 23, 1932, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to a bill and concurrent resolution of the Senate of the following titles:

S. 3570. An act to amend the act entitled "An act confirming in States and Territories title to land granted by the United States in the aid of common or public schools," approved January 25, 1927; and

S. Con. Res. 18. Concurrent resolution authorizing the printing of 3,000 additional copies of hearings held before the Committee on Manufactures on the establishment of a national economic council.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 8083) entitled "An act providing for the appointment as ensigns in the line of the Navy of all midshipmen who graduate from the Naval Academy in 1932," disagreed to by the House; agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. HALE, Mr. ODDIE, and Mr. TRAMMELL to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ECONOMY

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, when I was a little boy I had a chum named Jim Glibberson. He was a great fellow to make comparisons. He told me one day about going out to the fairgrounds to witness a horse race. There was great interest in the race—two horses from rival sections. But the judges could not get the race started. The riders of the horses jockeyed and jockeyed and jockeyed. Everybody was anxious for the race to start, because the clouds hung low, threatening rain, and finally the rain came while the riders still jockeyed, and they did not have any race at all.

I have been thinking, Mr. Speaker, about the jockeying between the White House and our Economy Committee during many waiting weeks and I am very fearful that the rain may come, and so I have decided to run a little race of my own. [Laughter.]

I have introduced this morning a little bill which will limit the salaries paid to the officers of the Federal reserve system and also the salaries of their agents and their attorneys and employees. I am told that some of those salaries run as high as $150,000 annually. My bill will do some real reducing.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. I yield.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I think the committee has already taken care of that proposal in the bill they are to present.

Mr. HOWARD. That is the most pleasing announcement I have had for some time, and yet is distressingly indefinite. It reminds me of the many conversations I had with Elizabeth before she consented to become my wife. She kept promising and promising all the time, but never could I get her to fix the day. [Laughter.]

Mr. McDUFFIE. Perhaps the gentleman had more to contend with than the Economy Committee had.

Mr. HOWARD. But I won out in the end. [Laughter.]

CLARA E. WIGHT

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 3580) for the relief of Clara E. Wight, with Senate amendments, and agree to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Page 1, line 5, after "Wight," insert "or upon her death to her husband, if he survives."

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$3,360" and insert "$50 per month, in an amount not to exceed $3,360."

Page 1, line 6, strike out "her" and insert "their."

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

MERGER OF STREET RAILWAYS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 154, to authorize the merger of street-railway corporations operating in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. THOMASON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, does anyone want time in opposition to the bill?

Mr. BOYLAN. I would like to have 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is any member of the Committee on the District of Columbia opposed to the bill?

Mr. BLACK. One member of the committee dissented from the report of the bill, but he does not happen to be present.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition to the bill.

Mr. PALMISANO. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. SWING. I shall take whatever the rule gives me. I do not think that I shall use it all.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, for a great many years Congress has struggled with the problem of competing street railways in the Capital City, never coming to any definite conclusion as to unification. Washington presents the spectacle of the only large city in the country that tolerates competing street-railway systems. Competing street-railway systems are not in the interest of the public. For a long period of years mergers of various types have been suggested, so that the public would have the advantage of a unified street-railway system. The bill before us has the approval of the Bureau of Efficiency, has the approval of the District Utilities Commission, has had careful study of a subcommittee of the Committee on the District of Columbia, which reported to the full committee, and that committee again in turn went into the bill, approving it, has the approval of every civic organization in Washington on the basic idea of a merger, and has the approval of the District Commissioners. It is largely the result of research work conducted by an expert on transportation who was retained by the Senate committee, Dr. Milo R. Maltbie, of New York. Suggestions for a unified system as programed in this bill came largely from the mind of this great expert, an expert who is not only recognized as fully informed on utility matters, but also as a great liberal in connection with utility matters. Some objections have been made to various parts of the bill. The Senate committee has reported the bill with changes with which the House committee does not see fit to concur. There is a general public demand in the city of Washington that something be done about the conflicting street-railway systems.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The charter of each one of these street railways provides that the railway company shall never charge the people of Washington more than 5 cents fare. That was a most valuable right that the street-railway companies received when they were given the exclusive privilege of placing their lines on the principal streets of the city of Washington. For years an attempt was made to hold them within their charter rights. I was hoping and praying that whenever the District Committee, which is a praying committee, did provide a merger, it would have a provision in the bill that would hold the railway to the charter provisions and come back to the 5-cent fare. If they would put on 5-cent fare to-morrow they would double and possibly treble the patronage they now enjoy. It would increase their revenues rather than diminish them, but when we proposed a reduction in street-car fares to half fare for children, they said they could not stand it. Finally, Congress woke up and forced them to a 3-cent fare for 70,000 school children in the city of Washington. Will not the committee agree to an amendment that will hold them to their charter rights?

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, the District Committee at the present time is a praying and a hoping committee, and in their prayers and in their hopes they are joined by all of the residents of Washington and all the large civic groups of Washington, that a merger bill pass, because of its manifest advantage to the people of the District. The fare question is a question that will be taken care of in due time in a regular, orderly way after a proper valuation under court direction by the Utilities Commission.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. What is the attitude of the two corporations toward the bill?

Mr. BLACK. The two corporations involved will accept the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. And that is one of the reasons that I am against it.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. What about the stockholders?

Mr. BLACK. It is anticipated that they will accept. It has not yet been put up to them.

Mr. GIBSON. How much of the money burden is shifted from the street-railway company to the District by this bill?

Mr. BLACK. I am coming to that in the course of my remarks.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I do not know about the details of the bill, but I know it has been before Congress for a great many years. I do not know who the stockholders are or who owns these railroads, but I know in the interest of economy and efficiency, as far as the city of Washington is concerned, they ought to be under one management, and I think if this bill properly carries that out and protects the interest of all of the people concerned, it is a proper bill and ought to be passed at this time.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. How about the 7 per cent dividend arrangement in the bill? That is hardly in keeping with the trend of the times, is it?

Mr. BLACK. The whole rate question is going to be decided purely and simply as a rate question.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I speak of dividends.

Mr. BLACK. Without regard to the capital structure that is lined up here. The people of the District are concerned with the convenience involved and the efficiency of the service and the ultimate fare, which will be predicated on a proper valuation made according to law.

The itemized advantages to the people of the District are first, free transfers from line to line, from street railway car to street railway car, something that does not exist at the present time.

There is now one line north and south, crossing two other lines. There are two lines east and west, and parallel to each other, owned by different companies. The line crossing them is owned by one of the two parallel companies. It only transfers to its own company. It does not transfer to the other company. The people of the District are insistent on this transfer.

There is another situation where one of the car lines will be going on a route to a certain place and it will strike the line of another company and will have to go around a couple of blocks to get back to its own line. Those extra tracks will be eliminated. One company's cars will be able to go over the other company's tracks, making the route shorter, making it more convenient for everybody.

The National Park and Planning Commission has this to say about the street railway situation in Washington:

> In order to coordinate the study of the highway system with the problem of transfers on the streets, a careful study of the street railroad system has also been made. It is believed that because of many characteristics the street railroad system gives a less effective service than would be possible if the existing lines could be combined in such way as to be operated practically as one unified system.

There is the National Park and Planning Commission's statement about this.

Taking all the car routes and adding together the number of turns that a car making a round trip on each would have to make, the National Park and Planning Commission found there are 340 right-hand turns and 330 left-hand turns.

There is also unnecessary duplication and paralleling of lines. It is evident that such conditions are not conducive to the greatest convenience of the public nor to ultimate economy of operation. The initial study of the commission has indicated the possibility that by building approximately 6 miles of new lines and abandoning some 16 miles of old track which now has to be maintained, there could be eliminated 180 right-hand turns and 160 left-hand turns.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK] has expired.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New York 10 additional minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am sure the House would be interested in receiving an explanation of the obligation that now pertains on the part of the Potomac Electric Power Co. in furnishing electric power to the Washington Railway & Electric Co. Under the agreement that has been proposed that right is to be terminated at a certain definite time. I notice there is a difference in the report on the House bill and the Senate bill on that particular question. It is a mooted question. Will the gentleman explain just what the obligation is to-day of this Potomac Electric Power Co. to the Washington Railway & Electric Co.?

Mr. BLACK. I would rather prefer to take that up when we come to the bill.

Now, it is perfectly obvious that there can not be two telephone companies running wires through the streets of the city, or three telephone companies or three water companies. It is just as absurd in this day and generation to have two separate street-railway lines running through the streets of a large city. They can not properly serve the people.

The basic effort made here is to bring about a unification for the service of the people of the District of Columbia.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McLEOD. I would like to inquire what is the status of the time?

The CHAIRMAN. There is no limitation on the time.

Mr. McLEOD. In other words, it will be possible for me to be recognized in this matter?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is a member of the committee and will be recognized.

Mr. BLACK. Ultimately the people of the District will benefit by the economies that the company is expected to put into operation as a result of the merger. The cutting down of unnecessary overhead, the doing away with unnecessary trackage, cutting down the capital structure, all those economies will permit the companies to give the people of Washington better service, first, by proper routing, and, second, by providing better equipment that can be purchased as a result of the economies.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. PATTERSON. What about reducing the street-car rates?

Mr. BLACK. And ultimately it is hoped that something may be done about giving the people better rates of fare. That all depends on the effectiveness of the economies.

Mr. PATTERSON. I am afraid that the hope is just a glamour.

Mr. BLACK. The employees of the street railways want this bill. The street railways in Washington are faced with very desperate competition; are faced with loss of revenue, and ultimately, if their financial situation grows much worse, the employees of the street-railway companies are faced with the loss of their jobs. The employees of the railway companies see in the merger the salvation of the companies, and as well, their own salvation.

I sat through all the hearings. There has been nobody before the committee or before the subcommittee who has objected to the idea of a merger. Not one single organization, not one single witness, nobody in Washington has denied the need of a merger.

There have been various suggested amendments. Some people fear giving the power of the street railways to one particular group. The committee has adopted an amendment providing that nine of the directors of the new company must be residents of the District of Columbia. It is thought that with nine resident directors the best interests of the city of Washington will be served.

There have been attempts made to tack on to this bill changes in the existing situation. Our committee looked at the picture originally and they saw two railways with existing rights.

They saw two railways presenting a system of competition that was a public nuisance. The committee decided to take the existing picture, the existing status of the two companies as far as their rights were concerned, and merge those rights without giving them much added power but eliminating the nuisance, except that involved in the merger.

The committee tried its level best to preserve the existing public utilities law and the Public Utilities Commission and all the safeguards surrounding the operation of railways in the District.

The committee was unwilling to interfere with the present rights of the railway companies. The committee was unwilling to change generally the public utilities law. The committee was unwilling to accept the various riders proposed.

A great number of gentlemen appeared before the committee and wanted to see the merger adopted but they had fears, they saw ghosts, they saw a great hobgoblin of a great street-railway system unified. They were unnecessarily disturbed about it. The committee looked at the requirements of the people of Washington. It looked at the possible fate of the employees of these railways. It looked at the condition of the stockholders in the smaller company, who are losing their investments day in and day out because of the competition that prevails here.

Now, on the power question generally: The committee thought that the contract between the Washington Railway & Electric Co. and the power company was a very valuable contract which should insure to the benefit of the new company. That is the reason the committee did not see fit to accept the Senate amendment that would have abrogated that contract. Another reason why the committee did not see fit to accept the Senate amendment was because it was a contract, and the committee felt it would be doing something unconstitutional if it interfered with that contract.

One of the main questions that came before our committee was the question of the liability of the merged company in operating taxicabs. Some members of the committee thought they should have the right to operate taxicabs.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes; I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. I would like to ask the gentleman about the 3-cent fare for school children. It is my understanding there was an act passed in 1931 granting this reduced fare. Mr. John J. Noonan, who was the largest minority stockholder in one of the concerns, I understand advocated that fare. Will the gentleman discuss that?

Mr. BLACK. I will get to that later. The committee has amended the bill as originally presented by the Public Utilities Commission to the effect that the merged company is absolutely barred from operating taxicabs in the District of Columbia. All they can do is to operate the trolley cars and operate busses. They can not operate taxicabs. They may engage in any form of operation that takes care of mass transportation; they can not take care of the individual who wants to go to a certain specified place, but they can take care of the individual who wants to travel with the public along certain defined routes. That is all the railway company may do.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I have been informed there is no opposition on the part of any of the people of Washington to this merger. Is that correct?

Mr. BLACK. There is nobody opposed to the basic idea of a merger. Nobody is opposed to the underlying structure of this bill. There have been various amendments offered, some of which have been accepted. There have been other amendments offered that had their foundation in fear. There have been other amendments offered to inhibit the public utilities from running this merged company. There have been other amendments offered making Congress a public-utilities commission. There have been other amendments offered making Congress the operator of a street-railway system in the District of Columbia. All of those amendments were rejected.

Now, on the question of fare for children. There was a law passed making that fare 3 cents. That has been taken into the court. It is still pending in the court. The committee could not see the wisdom of again putting that in the bill. It has not been decided as yet. If the court says the 3-cent fare stands, then it will apply to the merged corporation as well as it applies to the individual corporations. If the court says the 3-cent fare is unreasonable and unconstitutional, we can not make it any more reasonable or constitutional by putting it in the bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. BLACK. On the school-children question, there is this direct benefit to the school children: They are given free transfers as well as adults. When the Utilities Commission gets a decision from the court, and if the court gives them any latitude as to differentiating in rates as to children and adults, the Public Utilities Commission having before it a unified system, with the resulting economies, and having in mind the scheme and purpose of the merger, it is hoped the Public Utilities Commission will bring about a reasonable reduced fare for school children which will stand the test of the courts. Anything in the bill on that question would be an inhibition on the power of the Utilities Commission.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. This bill provides for the elimination of any payment on the part of the railway company of the salaries of crossing policemen. I understand that amounts to $125,000 a year. Also the question of paving will be eliminated on the part of the merged company, which amounts to over $300,000.

Mr. BLACK. There is a question as to the amount in both of those instances, but on the principle involved there is no other city in the country that makes a railway company pay for policemen. The policemen here are a part of the regular police force and they are paid for by the railway companies. There is no other city in the country that requires any railway company to pay its police force.

The District Commissioners and the Public Utility Commissioners and every civic organization and everybody concerned with the bill are for the elimination of the obligation of the corporations to pay for these crossing policemen.

Mr. ARENTZ. Is that on the basis that the railroad companies are not making enough dividends and we are going to give them $125,000, or is it on the basis of cutting down the fares?

Mr. BLACK. First, it is on the basis that it is absolutely an unsound relationship existing between the utility company and the municipality; and, second, it is an unfair and unjust charge on the utility company, consequently it is unjust to the stockholders and to the riders of the street cars and should be eliminated, with the idea and the definite hope of giving the possibility of success to the merger. It is a District contribution.

As a matter of fact, if I had my way about it and followed it through, I would seek remuneration for the companies for every cent they have paid to crossing policemen.

Mr. ARENTZ. You have only to ride on the street cars in the city here to see the necessity of crossing policemen, and providing crossing policemen has been in the interest of the street-car companies.
